

What You Need to Know About Earning Money and Supplemental Security Income (SSI)

The amount of your SSI payment each month is affected by your income and resources, which include the money you earn from work and your savings. Social Security offers work incentives to help you increase your income. Work incentives may allow us to exclude some of your income and give you the opportunity to continue receiving SSI while you work.

For example, you may use work incentives to increase your overall income while working during your summer breaks, on the weekends, or after school. If you are a student receiving special education services, you can also incorporate work incentives for SSI into your Individual Education Plan (IEP) and Transition Plan.

Information about our work incentives is available online at www.ssa.gov/redbook. The specific work incentives available to you depend on your situation, income, and type of benefits.

Examples of Work Incentives

The General Earned Income Exclusion allows most SSI recipients to exclude from countable income the first $65 of earnings plus one half of additional earnings.

The Student Earned Income Exclusion (SEIE) allows recipients who are students to exclude a certain amount of earnings from their countable income. In 2024, we will not count $2,290 of income in a month or $9,230 in a year. SEIE eligibility ends when a recipient turns age 22.

Meet Donnell and find out how Work Incentives helped them reach their goals

Donnell is 15 years old, has an intellectual disability, and loves video games.

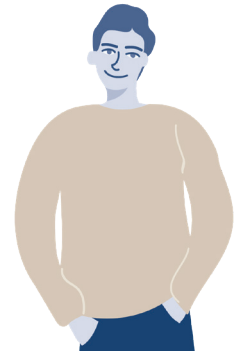

Donnell talked to their case manager about working for a local video game store this summer. Donnell asked:

“What happens to my SSI payments when I work during the summer?”

Donnell’s case manager explained how Donnell can use the SEIE while continuing to receive the SSI cash payments.

With the SEIE, in 2024, we will not count $2,290 of income in a month or $9,230 in a year. This means that earnings up to those limits will not change Donnell’s SSI payment amounts.

With Donnell’s question answered, they decide to work 20 hours a week during summer break.
