About the Series

The Foreign Relations of the United States series presents the official documentary historical record of major foreign policy decisions and significant diplomatic activity of the U.S. Government. The Historian of the Department of State is charged with the responsibility for the preparation of the Foreign Relations series. The staff of the Office of the Historian, Foreign Service Institute, under the direction of the General Editor of the Foreign Relations series, plans, researches, compiles, and edits the volumes in the series. Secretary of State Frank B. Kellogg first promulgated official regulations codifying specific standards for the selection and editing of documents for the series on March 26, 1925. These regulations, with minor modifications, guided the series through 1991.

Public Law 102-138, the Foreign Relations Authorization Act, established a new statutory charter for the preparation of the series, which was signed by President George H.W. Bush on October 28, 1991. Section 198 of P.L. 102-138 added a new Title IV to the Department of State's Basic Authorities Act of 1956 (22 U.S.C. 4351, et seq.).

The statute requires that the Foreign Relations series be a thorough, accurate, and reliable record of major U.S. foreign policy decisions and significant U.S. diplomatic activity. The volumes of the series should include all records needed to provide comprehensive documentation of major foreign policy decisions and actions of the U.S. Government. The statute also confirms the editing principles established by Secretary Kellogg: the Foreign Relations series is guided by the principles of historical objectivity and accuracy; records should not be altered or deletions made without indicating in the published text that a deletion has been made; the published record should omit no facts that were of major importance in reaching a decision; and nothing should be omitted for the purposes of concealing a defect in policy. The statute also requires that the Foreign Relations series be published not more than 30 years after the events recorded. The editors are convinced that this volume meets all regulatory, statutory, and scholarly standards of selection and editing.

Sources for the Foreign Relations Series

The Foreign Relations statute requires that the published record in the Foreign Relations series include all records needed to provide comprehensive documentation of major U.S. foreign policy decisions and significant U.S. diplomatic activity. It further requires that government agencies, departments, and other entities of the U.S. Government engaged in foreign policy formulation, execution, or support cooperate with the Department of State historians by providing full and complete access to records pertinent to foreign policy decisions and actions and by providing copies of selected records. Most of the sources consulted in the preparation of this volume have been declassified and are available for review at the National Archives and Records Administration.

The editors of the Foreign Relations series have complete access to all the retired records and papers of the Department of State: the central files of the Department; the special decentralized files ("lot files") of the Department at the bureau, office, and division levels; the files of the Department's Executive Secretariat, which contain the records of international conferences and high-level official visits, correspondence with foreign leaders by the President and Secretary of State, and the memoranda of conversations between the President and the Secretary of State and foreign officials; and the files of overseas diplomatic posts. All of the Department's central files for 1981–1989, which were stored in electronic and microfilm formats, will eventually be transferred to the National Archives. Once these files are declassified and processed, they will be accessible. All of the Department's decentralized office files from this period that the National Archives deems worthy of permanent preservation will also eventually be transferred to the National Archives where they will be available for use after declassification and processing.

Research for Foreign Relations volumes is undertaken through special access to restricted documents at the Ronald Reagan Presidential Library and other agencies. While all the material printed in this volume has been declassified, some of it is extracted from still-classified documents. The staff of the Reagan Library is processing and declassifying many of the documents used in this volume, but they may not be available in their entirety at the time of publication. Presidential papers maintained and preserved at the Reagan Library include some of the most significant foreign-affairs related documentation from White House offices, the Department of State, and other federal agencies including the National Security Council, the Central Intelligence Agency, the Department of Defense, and the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Some of the research for volumes in this subseries was done in Reagan Library record collections scanned for the Remote Archives Capture (RAC) project. This project, which is administered by the National Archives and Records Administration's Office of Presidential Libraries, was designed to coordinate the declassification of still classified records held in various Presidential libraries. Throughout the course of the project, many, but not all records at each Presidential library were scanned. As a result of the way in which records were scanned for the RAC, the editors of the Foreign Relations series were not always able to determine whether attachments to a given document were in fact attached to the paper copy of the document in the Reagan Library file. In such cases, some editors of the Foreign Relations series have indicated this ambiguity by stating that the attachments were "Not found attached."

Editorial Methodology

The documents are presented chronologically according to time in Washington DC. Memoranda of conversation are placed according to the time and date of the conversation, rather than the date the memorandum was drafted.

Editorial treatment of the documents published in the Foreign Relations series follows Office style guidelines, supplemented by guidance from the General Editor and the Chiefs of the Declassification and Publishing Divisions. The original document is reproduced as exactly as possible, including marginalia or other notations, which are described in the footnotes. Texts are transcribed and printed according to accepted conventions for the publication of historical documents within the limitations of modern typography. A heading has been supplied by the editors for each document included in this volume. Spelling, capitalization, and punctuation are retained as found in the original text, except that obvious typographical errors are silently corrected. Other mistakes and omissions in the documents are corrected by bracketed insertions: a correction is set in italic type; an addition in roman type. Words or phrases underlined in the original document are printed in italics. Abbreviations and contractions are preserved as found in the original text, and a list of abbreviations and terms is included in the front matter of each volume. In telegrams, the telegram number (including special designations such as Secto) is printed at the start of the text of the telegram.

Bracketed insertions are also used to indicate omitted text that deals with an unrelated subject (in roman type) or that remains classified after declassification review (in italic type). The amount and, where possible, the nature of the material not declassified has been noted by indicating the number of lines or pages of text that were omitted. Entire documents withheld after declassification review have been accounted for and are listed in their chronological place with headings, source notes, and number of pages not declassified.

All brackets that appear in the original text are so identified in footnotes. All ellipses are in the original documents.

The first footnote to each document indicates the source of the document and its original classification, distribution, and drafting information. This note also provides the background of important documents and policies and indicates whether the President or his major policy advisers read the document.

Editorial notes and additional annotation summarize pertinent material not printed in the volume, indicate the location of additional documentary sources, provide references to important related documents printed in other volumes, describe key events, and provide summaries of and citations to public statements that supplement and elucidate the printed documents. Information derived from memoirs and other first-hand accounts has been used when appropriate to supplement or explicate the official record.

Advisory Committee on Historical Diplomatic Documentation

The Advisory Committee on Historical Diplomatic Documentation, established under the Foreign Relations statute, monitors the overall compilation and editorial process of the series and advises on all aspects of the preparation of the series and declassification of records. The Advisory Committee does not necessarily review the contents of individual volumes in the series, but it makes recommendations on issues that come to its attention and reviews volumes as it deems necessary to fulfill its advisory and statutory obligations.

Declassification Review

The Office of Information Programs and Services, Bureau of Administration, conducted the declassification review for the Department of State of the documents published in this volume. The review was conducted in accordance with the standards set forth in Executive Order 13526 on Classified National Security Information and applicable laws.

The principle guiding declassification review is to release all information, subject only to the current requirements of national security as embodied in law and regulation. Declassification decisions entailed concurrence of the appropriate geographic and functional bureaus in the Department of State, other concerned agencies of the U.S. Government, and the appropriate foreign governments regarding specific documents of those governments. The declassification review of this volume, which began in 2018 and was completed in 2022, resulted in the decision to withhold 0 documents in full, excise a paragraph or more in 0 documents, and make minor excisions of less than a paragraph in 3 documents.

The Office of the Historian is confident, on the basis of the research conducted in preparing this volume and as a result of the declassification review process described above, that the documentation and editorial notes presented here provide a thorough, accurate, and reliable record of the intellectual foundations of the Reagan administration.

Preface

Structure and Scope of the Foreign Relations Series

This volume is part of a subseries of volumes of the Foreign Relations series that documents the most important issues in the foreign policy of the administration of Ronald Reagan. The subseries will present a documentary record of major foreign policy decisions and actions of President Reagan's administration. This volume documents the intellectual assumptions and themes underlying the foreign policy decisions made by the administration.

Focus of Research and Principles of Selection for Foreign Relations, 1981–1988, Volume I

The purpose of this volume is to document the intellectual foundations of the foreign policy of the Reagan administration. This volume explores the collective mindset of Reagan administration officials on foreign policy issues rather than documenting significant foreign policy decisions or diplomatic exchanges. The compilation takes as its canvas the entire eight-year record of the Reagan administration. The documents selected, therefore, are necessarily a sampling chosen to illustrate policy perspectives and themes rather than a thorough record of a bilateral relationship or of a major issue. Similar to Foreign Relations, 1969–1976, Volume I, Foundations of Foreign Policy, 1969–1972; Foreign Relations, 1969–1976, Volume XXXVIII, Part 1, Foundations of Foreign Policy, 1973–1976; and Foreign Relations, 1977–1980, Volume I, Foundations of Foreign Policy, this volume draws upon the published record of speeches, press releases, press conferences and background briefings, interviews, and testimony before Congressional committees in addition to the internal memoranda, correspondence, meeting minutes, and other records generated by administration officials, to document the positions and the assumptions of foreign policy makers. The editor of this volume sought to present a representative selection of documents chosen to elucidate the primary intellectual themes that ran through and influenced Reagan's foreign policy, including the desire to "reset" U.S. foreign policy following the war in Vietnam, Watergate scandal, and Iran hostage crisis; the emphasis on recreating a world structure hospitable to U.S. values; the necessity of developing an "activist" foreign policy characterized by bipartisanship; and the development of a U.S.-Soviet relationship based on restraint and reciprocity, among other objectives. The documents selected focus on the perspectives of the primary forces behind U.S. foreign policy during the Reagan years: President Reagan and Vice President George H.W. Bush; Secretaries of State Alexander Haig and George Shultz; and President's Assistants for National Security Affairs Richard Allen, William Clark, Robert McFarlane, John Poindexter, Frank Carlucci, and Colin Powell; as well as Secretary of Defense Caspar Weinberger and U.S. Permanent Representative to the United Nations Jeane Kirkpatrick. The volume also includes documentation reflecting the views of influential officials within the Department of State and National Security Council staff.

Acknowledgements

The editor wishes to acknowledge the assistance of Mike Duggan, Lisa Magana, Ira Pemstein, and Cate Sewell of the Ronald Reagan Presidential Library and Jeff Flannery and Ernest Emrich of the Library of Congress. Special access was granted to the Haig Papers at the Library of Congress with the kind permission of the Estate of Secretary Haig. Thanks are also due to the Central Intelligence Agency for arranging access to the Reagan Library materials scanned for the Remote Archives Capture (RAC) project and to John Kirkpatrick, who granted permission on the behalf of the Estate of Jeane Kirkpatrick to reprint excerpts of her article in Commentary.

The editor also wishes to thank Forrest Barnum, Sara Berndt, Josh Botts, Elizabeth Charles, David Geyer, Charles Hawley, Laura Kolar, Paul Pitman, Alexander Poster, Kathleen Rasmussen, Seth Rotramel, Daniel Rubin, Nathaniel Smith, Melissa Jane Taylor, Chris Tudda, Alexander Wieland, James Wilson, and Louise Woodroofe of the Office of the Historian for recommending documents for inclusion in the volume.

The editor conducted the research for this volume and selected and annotated the documentation under the direction of The Historian Adam M. Howard, then-General Editor of the Foreign Relations series. General Editor Kathleen B. Rasmussen, then-Chief of the Global Issues and General Division, reviewed the volume. Chris Tudda coordinated the declassification review under the supervision of the Chief of the Declassification Division Carl Ashley. Kerry Hite did the copy and technical editing under the supervision of the Chief of the Editing and Publishing Division Mandy A. Chalou.

Source for Foreign Relations, 1981–1988, Volume I, Foundations of Foreign Policy

Much of the documentation included in this volume was drawn from public sources. Speeches and policy statements were garnered from a number of published sources, most importantly the Public Papers of the Presidents of the United States and the Department of State Bulletin. Congressional Record, Documents on Disarmament, and Weekly Compilation of Presidential Documents were also consulted, as were numerous Congressional reports.

The declassified or open files at the Ronald Reagan Presidential Library also contain documentation on Reagan's public statements from both the pre-Presidential and Presidential years. A very useful source of information for the pre-Presidential period is the White House Office of Speechwriting, Research Office Files, especially Series IV, the 1980 Campaign File, which contains the statements and speeches made by Reagan and his Vice Presidential running mate, George H.W. Bush, during the course of the 1980 campaign. The collection also contains speeches from Reagan's earlier Presidential run in 1975–1976. Series I of the collection, Speeches, 1981–1989, contains various drafts of Reagan's speeches, including many with the President's handwritten notations. In addition, the White House Office of Records Management (WHORM) Subject File includes a speech file (SP) category, which similarly contains speech drafts and associated briefing materials. The 1980 Transition Papers collection yielded documentation on the incoming Reagan administration's preparation for the Presidential transition.

Among the classified sources consulted, the most useful were found in the Presidential Papers and other White House records maintained by the Reagan Library. A number of collections from the White House Staff and Office Files are relevant to research in this area. Within this collection, the files of Norman Bailey, Paula Dobriansky, Donald Fortier, David Gergen, and Robert McFarlane proved especially useful. In addition, the Executive Secretariat collections, especially the Subject File, yielded much information regarding the Reagan administration's forward planning during both the first and second administrations. Separate from the White House Staff and Office Files, the donated papers of Secretary of State George P. Shultz contain copies of incoming and outgoing memoranda, briefing books, and talking points for Shultz's meetings with the President and other foreign policy principals.

Of the lot files of the Department of State, the most useful for the purposes of this compilation were the Policy Planning Staff (S/P) Files. The Director's Files (Lot 89D149) contain the memoranda and correspondence from Directors Paul Wolfowitz, Stephen Bosworth, Peter Rodman, and Richard Solomon to Secretaries of State Alexander Haig and George Shultz and other Department principals. This chronological collection is especially useful, as it also includes memoranda concerning the administration's various forward planning exercises and documentation regarding proposed speeches by Haig and Shultz. Another useful lot file is the Executive Secretariat file containing Haig's memoranda of conversation (Lot 87D327). The Central Foreign Policy File of the Department of State, consisting of D, P, and N microfilm reels, replaced the pre-1973 paper subject-numeric file. The D and N reels contain the cable traffic between Washington and diplomatic and consular posts abroad and, for the purposes of this particular volume, provide additional background information concerning key concepts and events. The P reels consist of microfilmed versions of memoranda of conversation, letters, briefing papers, airgrams, and memoranda to principals. The National Archives and Records Administration facility in College Park, Maryland, will eventually include these collections as part of Record Group 59 (RG 59).

The personal papers of Secretary of State Haig, located at the Library of Congress, contain many key documents illuminating Haig's world view. In addition, the Library holds the personal papers of Donald Regan, which describe the forward planning process at the mid-point of the administration, as well as the administration's efforts to manage Executive-Legislative relations.

In addition to the paper files cited below, a growing number of documents are available on the Internet. The Office of the Historian maintains a list of these Internet resources on its website and encourages readers to consult that site on a regular basis.

Foundations of Foreign Policy, 1975–1980

1. Editorial Note

Former California Governor Ronald Reagan declared his candidacy for the 1976 Republican Presidential nomination on November 20, 1975. In so doing, Reagan issued a challenge to incumbent Republican President Gerald Ford. Speaking at a news conference held at the National Press Club in Washington, D.C. that day, Reagan stated: “I’ve called this press conference to announce that I am a candidate for the Presidency and to ask for the support of all Americans who share my belief that our nation needs to embark on a new, constructive course.

“I believe my candidacy will be healthy for the nation and my party.

“I am running because I have grown increasingly concerned about the course of events in the United States and in the world.”

After commenting on the economy, the role of government, and U.S. dependence on foreign energy sources, Reagan continued: “A decade ago, we had military superiority. Today we are in danger of being surpassed by a nation that has never made any effort to hide its hostility to everything we stand for.

“Through détente we have sought peace with our adversaries. We should continue to do so, but must make it plain that we expect a stronger indication that they also seek a lasting peace with us.”

Reagan stressed that “the root of these problems” facing the United States stemmed from unresponsive leadership in Washington. He asserted: “If America is to survive and go forward, this must change. It will only change when the American people vote for a leadership that listens to them, relies on them, and seeks to return government to them. We need a government that is confident not of what it can do, but of what the people can do.”

Reagan concluded his statement by saying: “In the coming months I will take this message to the American people. I will talk in detail about responsible, responsive government. I will tell the people it is they who should decide how much government they want.

“I don’t believe for one moment that four more years of business-as-usual in Washington is the answer to our problems and I don’t think the American people believe it either.

“We, as a people, aren’t happy if we are not moving forward. A nation that is growing and thriving is one which will solve its problems. We must offer progress instead of stagnation; the truth instead of promises; hope and faith instead of defeatism and despair. Then, I am sure the people will make those decisions which will restore confidence in our way of life and release that energy that is the American spirit.” (Statement, November 20, 1975; Reagan Library, Vertical File, Reagan, Ronald W.—Speeches and Articles (1974–1976))

Following the announcement, Reagan departed Washington for Miami, his first stop on a 2-day campaign tour of Florida, New Hampshire, North Carolina, Illinois, and California. For additional information about the announcement and the campaign trip, see Jon Nordheimer, “Reagan Enters Campaign, Seeks a Curb on Spending,” New York Times, November 21, 1975, pages 1, 20, and Joseph Lelyveld, “Reagan Campaign Debut: A 2-Day TV Event,” New York Times, November 22, 1975, page 52.

Throughout the spring of 1976, Reagan competed against Ford in the Republican primaries. During the Republican National Convention, held in Kansas City, Missouri, August 16–19, 1976, delegates placed both Ford’s and Reagan’s names in nomination. On August 17, Reagan lost to Ford on the first ballot. Ford and Reagan subsequently took part in an exchange and question-and-answer session on the afternoon of August 19 at the Alameda Plaza Hotel, where Reagan was staying throughout the convention. Ford began the exchange by congratulating Reagan “on a very fine campaign.” Reagan responded: “Mr. President, my congratulations to you. It was a good fight, Mom, and he won. My congratulations.

“And, of course, you know that as we both agreed all the way from the very beginning, once the fight was over, we are on the same side, and we go forward together.” (Public Papers: Ford, 1976–1977, Book III, page 2149)

That evening, Reagan offered remarks to the convention delegates. After his initial comments, the former governor said: “May I just say some words. There are cynics who say that a party platform is something that no one bothers to read and it doesn’t very often amount to much.

“Whether it is different this time than it has ever been before, I believe the Republican Party has a platform that is a banner of bold, unmistakable colors with no pale pastel shades.

“We have just heard a call to arms based on that platform. And a call to arms to really be successful in communicating and reveal to the American people the difference between this platform and the platform of the opposing party, which is nothing but a revamped and a reissue and a running of a late, late show of the thing that we’ve been hearing from them for the last 40 years.

“If I could just take a moment—I had an assignment the other day. Someone asked me to write a letter for a time capsule that is going to be opened in Los Angeles a hundred years from now, on our Tricentennial.

“It sounded like an easy assignment. They suggested I write something about the problems and issues of the day. And I said I could do so, riding down the coast in an automobile, looking at the blue Pacific out on one side and the Santa Ines Mountains on the other, and I couldn’t help but wonder if it was going to be that beautiful a hundred years from now as it was on that summer day.

“Then, as I tried to write—let your own minds turn to that task. You’re going to write for people a hundred years from now who know all about us. We know nothing about them. We don’t know what kind of a world they’ll be living in.

“And suddenly, thought to myself as I write of the problems, they’ll be the domestic problems of which the President spoke here tonight; the challenges confronting us; the erosion of freedom that has taken place under Democrat rule in this country; the invasion of private rights; the controls and restrictions on the vitality of the great free economy that we enjoy. These are our challenges that we must meet.

“And then again there is that challenge of which he spoke, that we live in a world in which the great powers have poised and aimed at each other horrible missiles of destruction, nuclear weapons that can in a matter of minutes arrive in each other’s country and destroy virtually the civilized world we live in.

“And suddenly it dawned on me, those who would read this letter a hundred years from now will know whether those missiles were fired. They will know whether we met our challenge.

“Whether they had the freedom that we have known up until now, will depend on what we do here. Will they look back with appreciation and say, thank God for those people in 1976 who headed off that loss of freedom; who kept us now a hundred years later free; who kept our world from nuclear destruction? And if we fail, they probably won’t get to read the letter at all because it spoke of individual freedom and they won’t be allowed to talk of that or read of it.

“This is our challenge. And this is why here in this hall tonight. Better than we’ve ever done before, we’ve got to quit talking to each other and about each other and go out and communicate to the world that we may be fewer in number than we’ve ever been. But we carry the message they’re waiting for.

“We must go forth from here united, determined, that what a great general said a few years ago is true: There is no substitute for victory.” (Transcript of Reagan’s Remarks to the Convention; New York Times, August 20, 1976, page 12)

2. Editorial Note

In the November 1, 1979, issue of Commentary Magazine, Georgetown University Professor Jeane Kirkpatrick published an article entitled, "Dictatorships & Double Standards." Kirkpatrick began the article by writing: "The failure of the Carter administration's foreign policy is now clear to everyone except its architects, and even they must entertain private doubts, from time to time, about a policy whose crowning achievement has been to lay the groundwork for a transfer of the Panama Canal from the United States to a swaggering Latin dictator of Castroite bent. In the thirty-odd months since the inauguration of Jimmy Carter as President there has occurred a dramatic Soviet military buildup, matched by the stagnation of American armed forces, and a dramatic extension of Soviet influence in the Horn of Africa, Afghanistan, Southern Africa, and the Caribbean, matched by a declining American position in all these areas. The U.S. has never tried so hard and failed so utterly to make and keep friends in the Third World.

"As if this were not bad enough, in the current year the United States has suffered two other major blows—in Iran and Nicaragua—of large and strategic significance. In each country, the Carter administration not only failed to prevent the undesired outcome, it actively collaborated in the replacement of moderate autocrats friendly to American interests with less friendly autocrats of extremist persuasion. It is too soon to be certain about what kind of regime will ultimately emerge in either Iran or Nicaragua, but accumulating evidence suggests that things are as likely to get worse as to get better in both countries. The Sandinistas in Nicaragua appear to be as skillful in consolidating power as the Ayatollah Khomeini is inept, and leaders of both revolutions display an intolerance and arrogance that do not bode well for the peaceful sharing of power or the establishment of constitutional governments, especially since those leaders have made clear that they have no intention of seeking either.

"It is at least possible that the SALT debate may stimulate new scrutiny of the nation's strategic position and defense policy, but there are no signs that anyone is giving serious attention to this nation's role in Iranian and Nicaraguan developments—despite clear warnings that the U.S. is confronted with similar situations and options in El Salvador, Guatemala, Morocco, Zaire, and elsewhere. Yet no problem of American foreign policy is more urgent than that of formulating a morally and strategically acceptable, and politically realistic, program for dealing with non-democratic governments who are threatened by Soviet-sponsored subversion. In the absence of such a policy, we can expect that the same reflexes that guided Washington in Iran and Nicaragua will be permitted to determine American actions from Korea to Mexico—with the same disastrous effects on the U.S. strategic position. (That the administration has not called its polices in Iran and Nicaragua a failure—and probably does not consider them as such—complicates the problem without changing its nature.)”

Kirkpatrick devoted the body of the article to outlining the common assumptions that Carter administration officials “brought to the crises in Iran and Nicaragua,” explaining the intellectual foundations of Carter’s foreign policy, and assessing the limitations of his approach. She concluded: “The President’s mistakes and distortions are all fashionable ones. His assumptions are those of people who want badly to be on the progressive side in conflicts between ‘rightist’ autocracy and ‘leftist’ challenges, and to prefer the latter, almost regardless of the probable consequences.

“To be sure, neither the President, nor [Cyrus] Vance, nor [Zbigniew] Brzezinski desires the proliferation of Soviet-supported regimes. Each has asserted his disapproval of Soviet ‘interference’ in the modernization process. But each, nevertheless, remains willing to ‘destabilize’ friendly or neutral autocracies without any assurance that they will not be replaced by reactionary totalitarian theocracies, totalitarian Soviet client states, or worst of all, by murderous fanatics of the Pol Pot variety.

“The foreign policy of the Carter administration fails not for lack of good intentions but for lack of realism about the nature of traditional versus revolutionary autocracies and the relation of each to the American national interest. Only intellectual fashion and the tyranny of Right/Left thinking prevent intelligent men of good will from perceiving the facts that traditional authoritarian governments are less repressive than revolutionary autocracies, that they are more susceptible of liberalization, and that they are more compatible with U.S. interests. The evidence on all these points is clear enough.

“Surely it is now beyond reasonable doubt that the present governments of Vietnam, Cambodia, Laos are much more repressive than those of the despised previous rulers; that the government of the People’s Republic of China is more repressive than that of Taiwan, that North Korea is more repressive than South Korea, and so forth. This is the most important lesson of Vietnam and Cambodia. It is not new but it is a gruesome reminder of harsh facts.

“From time to time a truly bestial ruler can come to power in either type of autocracy—Idi Amin, Papa Doc Duvalier, Joseph Stalin, Pol Pot are examples—but neither type regularly produces such moral monsters (though democracy regularly prevents their accession to power). There are, however, systemic differences between traditional and revolutionary autocracies that have a predictable effect on their degree of repressiveness. Generally speaking, traditional autocrats tolerate social inequities, brutality, and poverty while revolutionary autocracies create them.

“Traditional autocrats leave in place existing allocations of wealth, power, status, and other resources which in most traditional societies favor an affluent few and maintain masses in poverty. But they worship traditional gods and observe traditional taboos. They do not disturb the habitual rhythms of work and leisure, habitual places of residence, habitual patterns of family and personal relations. Because the miseries of traditional life are familiar, they are bearable to ordinary people who, growing up in the society, learn to cope, as children born to untouchables in India acquire the skills and attitudes necessary for survival in the miserable roles they are destined to fill. Such societies create no refugees.

“Precisely the opposite is true of revolutionary Communist regimes. They create refugees by the million because they claim jurisdiction over the whole life of the society and make demands for change that so violate internalized values and habits that inhabitants flee by the tens of thousands in the remarkable expectation that their attitudes, values, and goals will ‘fit’ better in a foreign country than in their native land.

“The former deputy chairman of Vietnam’s National Assembly from 1976 to his defection early in August 1979, Hoang Van Hoan, described recently the impact of Vietnam’s ongoing revolution on that country’s more than one million Chinese inhabitants:

“‘They have been expelled from places they have lived in for generations. They have been dispossessed of virtually all possessions—their lands, their houses. They have been driven into areas called new economic zones, but they have not been given any aid. How can they eke out a living in such conditions reclaiming new land? They gradually die for a number of reasons—diseases, the hard life. They also die of humiliation.’

“It is not only the Chinese who have suffered in Southeast Asia since the ‘liberation,’ and it is not only in Vietnam that the Chinese suffer. By the end of 1978 more than six million refugees had fled countries ruled by Marxist governments. In spite of walls, fences, guns, and sharks, the steady stream of people fleeing revolutionary utopias continues.

“There is a damning contrast between the number of refugees created by Marxist regimes and those created by other autocracies: more than a million Cubans have left their homeland since Castro’s rise (one refugee for every nine inhabitants) as compared to about 35,000 each from Argentina, Brazil, and Chile. In Africa more than five times as many refugees have fled Guinea and Guinea Bissau as have left Zimbabwe Rhodesia, suggesting that civil war and racial discrimination are easier for most people to bear than Marxist-style liberation.

“Moreover, the history of this century provides no grounds for expecting that radical totalitarian regimes will transform themselves. At the moment there is a far greater likelihood of progressive liberalization and democratization in the governments of Brazil, Argentina, and Chile than in the government of Cuba; in Taiwan than in the People’s Republic of China; in South Korea than in North Korea; in Zaire than in Angola; and so forth.

“Since many traditional autocracies permit limited contestation and participation, it is not impossible that U.S. policy could effectively encourage this process of liberalization and democratization, provided that the effort is not made at a time when the incumbent government is fighting for its life against violent adversaries, and that proposed reforms are aimed at producing gradual change rather than perfect democracy overnight. To accomplish this, policymakers are needed who understand how actual democracies have actually come into being. History is a better guide than good intentions.

“A realistic policy which aims at protecting our own interest and assisting the capacities for self-determination of less developed nations will need to face the unpleasant fact that, if victorious, violent insurgency headed by Marxist revolutionaries is unlikely to lead to anything but totalitarian tyranny. Armed intellectuals citing Marx and supported by Soviet-bloc arms and advisers will almost surely not turn out to be agrarian reformers, or simple nationalists, or democratic socialists. However incomprehensible it may be to some, Marxist revolutionaries are not contemporary embodiments of the Americans who wrote the Declaration of Independence, and they will not be content with establishing a broad-based coalition in which they have only one voice among many.

“It may not always be easy to distinguish between democratic and totalitarian agents of change, but it is also not too difficult. Authentic democratic revolutionaries aim at security governments based on the consent of the governed and believe that ordinary men are capable of using freedom, knowing their own interest, choosing rulers. They do not, like the current leaders in Nicaragua, assume that it will be necessary to postpone elections for three to five years during which time they can ‘cure’ the false consciousness of almost everyone.

“If, moreover, revolutionary leaders describe the United States as the scourge of the 20th century, the enemy of freedom-loving people, the perpetrator of imperialism, racism, colonialism, genocide, war, then they are not authentic democrats or, to put it mildly, friends. Groups which define themselves as enemies should be treated as enemies. The United States is not in fact a racist, colonial power, it does not practice genocide, it does not threaten world peace with expansionist activities. In the last decade especially we have practiced remarkable forbearance everywhere and undertaken the ‘unilateral restraints on defense spending’ recommended by Brzezinski as appropriate for the technetronic era. We have also moved further, faster, in eliminating domestic racism than any multiracial society in the world or in history.

“For these reasons and more, a posture of continuous self-abasement and apology vis-a-vis the Third World is neither morally necessary nor politically appropriate. No more is it necessary or appropriate to support vocal enemies of the United States because they invoke the rhetoric of popular liberation. It is not even necessary or appropriate for our leaders to forswear unilaterally the use of military force to counter military force. Liberal idealism need not be identical with masochism, and need not be incompatible with the defense of freedom and the national interest.” (Commentary, vol. 68, no. 5, November 1, 1979, pages 34–45. 3. Editorial Note Seeking the 1980 Republican Presidential nomination, former California Governor Ronald Reagan announced his candidacy in a television address taped in New York on November 12, 1979, and broadcast in most national television markets the evening of November 13. Reagan began by discussing his background and the different perspectives from which he had seen the United States. He then explained what the country meant to him: “To me our country is a living, breathing presence, unimpressed by what others say is impossible, proud of its own success, generous, yes and naïve, sometimes wrong, never mean and always impatient to provide a better life for its people in a framework of a basic fairness and freedom.

“Someone once said that the difference between an American and any other kind of person is that an American lives in anticipation of the future because he knows it will be a great place. Other people fear the future as just a repetition of past failures. There’s a lot of truth in that. If there is one thing we are sure of it is that history need not be relived; that nothing is impossible, and that man is capable of improving his circumstances beyond what we are told is fact.

“There are those in our land today, however, who would have us believe that the United States, like other great civilizations of the past, has reached the zenith of its power; that we are weak and fearful, reduced to bickering with each other and no longer possessed of the will to cope with our problems.

“Much of this talk has come from leaders who claim that our problems are too difficult to handle. We are supposed to meekly accept their failures as the most which humanly can be done. They tell us we must learn to live with less, and teach our children that their lives will be less full and prosperous than ours have been, that the America of the coming years will be a place where because of our past excesses—it will be impossible to dream and make those dreams come true.

“I don’t believe that. And, I don’t believe you do either. That is why I am seeking the presidency. I cannot and will not stand by and see this great country destroy itself. Our leaders attempt to blame their failures on circumstances beyond their control, on false estimates by unknown, unidentifiable experts who rewrite modern history in an attempt to convince us our high standard of living, the result of thrift and hard work, is somehow selfish extravagance which we must renounce as we join in sharing scarcity. I don’t agree that our nation must resign itself to inevitable decline, yielding its proud position to other hands. I am totally unwilling to see this country fail in its obligation to itself and to the other free peoples of the world.

“The crisis we face is not the result of any failure of the American spirit; it is a failure of our leaders to establish rational goals and give our people something to order their lives by. If I am elected, I shall regard my election as proof that the people of the United States have decided to set a new agenda and have recognized that the human spirit thrives best when goals are set and progress can be measured in their achievement.”

Reagan proceeded to highlight several issues, including the economy, taxes, the federal government, and domestic energy policy. He then turned to foreign policy: “On the foreign front, the decade of the 1980’s will place severe pressures upon the United States and its allies. We can expect to be tested in ways calculated to try our patience, to confound our resolve and to erode our belief in ourselves. During a time when the Soviet Union may enjoy nuclear superiority over this country, we must never waiver in our commitment to our allies nor accept any negotiation which is not clearly in the national interest. We must judge carefully. Though we should leave no initiative untried in our pursuit of peace, we must be clear voiced in our resolve to resist any unpeaceful act wherever it may occur. Negotiation with the Soviet Union must never become appeasement.

“For the most of the last forty years, we have been preoccupied with the global struggle—the competition—with the Soviet Union and with our responsibilities to our allies. But too often in recent times we have just drifted along with events, responding as if we thought of ourselves as a nation in decline. To our allies we seem to appear to be a nation unable to make decisions in its own interests, let alone in the common interest. Since the Second World War we have spent large amounts of money and much of our time protecting and defending freedom all over the world. We must continue this, for if we do not accept the responsibilities of leadership, who will? And if no one will, how will we survive?

“The 1970’s have taught us the foolhardiness of not having a long-range diplomatic strategy of our own. The world has become a place where, in order to survive, our country needs more than just allies—it needs real friends. Yet, in recent times we often seem not to have recognized who our friends are. This must change. It is now time to take stock of our own house and to resupply its strength.”

After a brief discussion of Puerto Rico, Reagan turned his attention to the benefits of hemispheric cooperation among the United States, Canada, and Mexico. Reagan urged the conclusion of a “North American accord” among the three countries, asserting that the “key to our own future security may lie in both Mexico and Canada becoming much stronger countries than they are today,” and stated that, if elected, he “would immediately seek the views and ideas of Canadian and Mexican leaders” in order to pursue “cooperation on a broader and more significant scale.” Reagan then concluded his remarks by stating: “In recent months leaders in our government have told us that we, the people, have lost confidence in ourselves; that we must regain our spirit and our will to achieve our national goals. Well, it is true there is a lack of confidence, an unease with things the way they are. But the confidence we have lost is confidence in our government’s policies. Our unease can almost be called bewilderment at how our defense strength has deteriorated. The great productivity of our industry is now surpassed by virtually all the major nations who compete with us for world markets. And, our currency is no longer the stable measure of value it once was.

“But there remains the greatness of our people, our capacity for dreaming up fantastic deeds and bringing them off to the surprise of an unbelieving world. When Washington’s men were freezing at Valley Forge, Tom Paine told his fellow Americans: ‘We have it in our power to begin the world over again.’ We still have that power.

“We—today’s living Americans—have in our lifetime fought harder, paid a higher price for freedom and done more to advance the dignity of man than any people who ever lived on this earth.

The citizens of this great nation want leadership—yes—but not a ‘man on a white horse’ demanding obedience to his commands. They want someone who believes they can ‘begin the world over again.’ A leader who will unleash their great strength and remove the roadblocks government has put in their way. I want to do that more than anything I’ve ever wanted. And it’s something that I believe with God’s help I can do.

“I believe this nation hungers for a spiritual revival; hungers to once again see honor placed above political expediency; to see government once again the protector of our liberties, not the distributor of gifts and privilege. Government should uphold and not undermine those institutions which are custodians of the very values upon which civilization is founded—religion, education and, above all, family. Government cannot be clergyman, teacher and parent. It is our servant, beholden to us.

“We who are privileged to be Americans have had a rendezvous with destiny since the moment in 1630 when John Winthrop, standing on the deck of the tiny Arbella off the coast of Massachusetts, told the little band of Pilgrims, ‘We shall be as a city upon a hill. The eyes of all people are upon us so that if we shall deal falsely with our God in this work we have undertaken and so cause Him to withdraw His present help from us, we shall be made a story and a byword throughout the world.’

“A troubled and afflicted mankind looks to us, pleading for us to keep our rendezvous with destiny; that we will uphold the principles of self-reliance, self-discipline, morality, and—above all—responsible liberty for every individual that we will become that shining city on a hill.

“I believe that you and I together can keep this rendezvous with destiny.” (Official announcement, November 13, 1979; Reagan Library, White House Office of Speechwriting, Research Office, 1980 Campaign File, Campaign and Pre-Presidential Speeches, 1979–1981, 11/13/1979 Reagan Announces Campaign for Presidency)

RONALD REAGAN'S STATEMENT ON THE STATE OF THE UNION ADDRESS

Having reviewed Mr. Carter's State of the Union address last evening,² I must today speak out strongly on the crises in Iran and Afghanistan.³ Mr. Carter terms the Afghan crises as "the most serious threat to world peace since the Second World War", yet he is willing to accept the Soviet presence in Afghanistan with a vague threat that if further aggression transpires in the Persian Gulf he may do something. I wonder how the Pakistanis feel about American resolve when they have, in effect, been excluded from the protection of even this vague threat of American action. And how seriously will the Soviet Union treat Mr. Carter's threat to take action in the Persian Gulf when it is accompanied by his voluntary pledge to unilaterally observe the terms of SALT I and SALT II treaties.⁴ We are in a power poker game with

⁴ In his State of the Union address (see footnote 2, above), Carter asserted: "Especially now, in a time of great tension, observing the mutual constraints imposed by the terms of these treaties [SALT I and SALT II] will be in the best interest of both countries and will help to preserve world peace." (Foreign Relations, 1977–1980, vol. I, Foundations of Foreign Policy, Document 138) On January 25, at a news conference at the Southern Republican Leadership Conference in New Orleans, Reagan again referenced Carter's statement, saying: "Today I call upon Mr. Carter to tell the Soviet Union that we will no longer observe the provisions of the SALT II treaty and that we shall no longer give unilateral support to the expired SALT I Agreement unless or until Soviet troops are withdrawn from Afghanistan." the Soviet Union. Grain embargoes and threats to refuse to attend the Olympics are not responsive to the Soviet call of our hand.⁵

In Iran, 50 innocent Americans are still being held hostage as a result of an act of war on our embassy.⁶ I cannot doubt that our failure to act decisively at the time that this happened provided the Russians with the final encouragement to invade Afghanistan. All Mr. Carter's attempts at negotiation have failed and now he seems to think that the Iranians may soon desire American protection against the Russians and that some hope can be found in this. Mr. Carter is either deceitful or a fool if this is what he believes. How on earth could this Iranian government look for help from a country that doesn't even possess the will to act decisively when its embassy is seized and its diplomats held hostage? How in the world can Mr. Carter offer protection to Iran when Iran more than any other country knows how weak we are?

The Iranians bet that Mr. Carter would be weak in responding to an act of war. They were right. The Soviet Union has bet that Mr. Carter is too weak to respond to its invasion of Afghanistan. And they were right. Mr. Carter is encouraging the belief that this nation will not risk war no matter what the provocation. In doing so he is increasing the chances of a nuclear confrontation. It is time for him to make our resolve clear to the American people in terms that are specific.

⁶ The Iranians released several of the hostages in mid-November. See Michael Getler, "Freed Trio Arrives at U.S. Hospital in Germany," and "10 Freed Hostages Join Colleagues in Wiesbaden," both Washington Post, November 20, 1979, p. A11, and November 21, 1979, p. A15, respectively.

5. Excerpts From a Speech by Ronald Reagan¹

Worcester, Massachusetts, February 15, 1980

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

Excerpts from Speech by Ronald Reagan at the 64th Annual Worcester County Lincoln Day Dinner

I believe that if peace in the world is to be maintained, America must be strong, reliable and predictable. That is why I have spoken extensively about the glaring defects and contradictions of this Administration's foreign and national security policies.

Jimmy Carter risks our national security—our credibility—and damages American purposes by sending timid and even contradictory signals to the Soviet Union. The crisis of confidence which pervades this Administration has become a permanent feature of our daily lives.

I intend to continue calling the Carter Administration to account for its stewardship of American security in an increasingly dangerous and threatening world.

I have great confidence and deep admiration for the basic strength and the sound and noble convictions of the American people.

I am appalled by the lack of conviction on the part of those who now manage our foreign and defense policies. And dismayed by the extent to which our basic strength has been so bobbled up by our own government that our enemies now begin to surpass us in nearly every measure of military power.

We must take steps to reverse the trend toward weakness and confusion. The decade of the eighties has begun with a warning to the West that it must once again be prepared to defend its legitimate interests. There is a more specific warning to the United States, as the leader of the Free World. The message is simple and straight forward—"get your house in order, establish your priorities carefully and marshal your great resources for the defense of freedom."

The prerequisite for taking even the first step to redress this shifting balance against the United States, is to formulate a coherent, consistent and principled grand strategy; our plan for action, our agenda for the 1980's. And that strategy must be clearly understood at home and abroad, by friends and enemies and those who are neither. Its central principle must be the preservation of peace and freedom.

My first task would be to set in motion policies that will achieve our American priorities. And I would like to share with you tonight some of those priorities as I see them.

To begin with, we have to:

- rebuild this country's military strength; and
- base our foreign policy again on the convictions of the American people.

Rebuilding our military strength will require time and prudence; a sustained effort, pursued with perseverance and guided by a long-term plan.

We have permitted the Russians to move ahead of us in every type of weaponry. The principal blame for this belongs with the Democratic-controlled Congress and, more recently, with the disastrous defense and arms control policies of the Carter Administration.

Now we most exploit fully our potential advantage in technology and work closely with our allies.

Stronger Deterrent Forces

First of all, our nuclear strategic deterrent must not be weakened. We must make our nuclear forces less vulnerable so that our adversaries will never be tempted to destroy our missiles and our bombers with a passive surprise attack. We also need more flexible and stronger deterrent forces to prevent any kind of nuclear attack and to discourage nuclear blackmail, or major armed aggression, against our allies and friends.

Naval Superiority

We need a superior navy. We are a maritime nation with vital interests and commitments overseas. Our navy must stay ahead of the Soviet build-up. This means building the ships and developing the technology that will enable us to command the oceans for the decades to come.

Military Strength

We must restore our capacity to project our military strength to those vital regions where further expansion of Soviet imperialism threatens our national security. We must have the military assets in hand that can protect our friends and our interests in the Persian Gulf region. Proclaiming that military force will be employed to defend those interests when we haven't the military power to do so is a hollow "doctrine."²

Research and Development

We have to take full advantage of the contributions that American science and technology can make to the defense of the United States and to the protection of peace. This requires a vigorous expansion of our research and development efforts.

U.S. Intelligence

We must once again restore the United States intelligence community. A Democratic Congress, aided and abetted by the Carter Administration, has succeeded in shackling and demoralizing our intelligence services to the point that they cannot function effectively as a component part of our defenses. Senseless restrictions requiring the Central Intelligence Agency to report any and all covert actions to eight Congressional committees, must be eliminated.³ National leaders must have reliable intelligence upon which to base sound policies; and this calls for a first-class intelligence capability with high morale and dedicated people. We have the means to regenerate our intelligence capabilities, and I would employ those means.

Message of Freedom

We need to get the American message out to the world in a coherent, understandable fashion. It is time to expand dramatically the Voice of America, Radio Free Europe and Radio Liberty. We have a message of peace and hope and nothing to be ashamed of in the example we set for the world. Millions upon millions of people look to us as a beacon of freedom in a world that is fast losing freedom. We can convey our own deep convictions to the world, to combat the hostile and ceaseless communist propaganda that distorts everything we stand for.

² Presumable reference to Carter's State of the Union address (see footnote 2, Document 4) and the promulgation of what would become known as the "Carter Doctrine." In his address, Carter stated: "Let our position be absolutely clear: An attempt by any outside force to gain control of the Persian Gulf region will be regarded as an assault on the vital interests of the United States of America, and such an assault will be repelled by any means necessary, including military force."

³ Presumable reference to the Foreign Assistance Act of 1974 (P.L. 93–559), which Ford signed into law on December 30, 1974. The Act included the Hughes-Ryan Amendment, co-authored by Senator Harold Hughes (D-Iowa) and Representative Leo Ryan (D-California), which amended the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 (P.L. 87–195) to require the President to report all covert actions of the Central Intelligence Agency to several congressional committees, including the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and the House Foreign Affairs Committee. For additional information concerning the impact of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1974 regarding congressional reporting, see Foreign Relations, 1969–1976, vol. XXXVIII, Part 2, Organization and Management of Foreign Policy; Public Diplomacy, 1973–1976, Document 26 and footnotes 3 and 4 thereto.

Stronger Alliances

And finally, we need to shore up our alliance with those friends who rely on us and who truly want America to be a strong, resolute and faithful ally. The NATO alliance will certainly be tested in the near future as the Soviet Union tries to drive a wedge between us and our partners, Japan, with the free world's second strongest economy, an industrious and creative people has no significant military strength with which to defend itself and is totally dependent on others for natural resources, oil and food. With these allies and with others we must expand our consultation and eliminate the unpredictability in our policies which weaken the bonds between us. Closer to home, we must enter the eighties with a North American continent united in purpose, utilizing the tremendous human and natural resources which await the application of our technology and our capital resources. This is the essence of the North American Accord which I have proposed.⁴

To influence events abroad, the United States should not have to rely on military power alone. Military strength is absolutely essential for our protection and to preserve the peace, but it must always be an instrument of last resort.

Our foreign policy should aim to avoid both retreat and the need for military intervention. We must have ways to help our friends and to defend our interests without having to send in the Marines.

We used to have such a capacity. Jimmy Carter had the option of building on that strength, but chose illusion and weakness instead.

There are sound alternatives to the disastrous policies of this Administration, and tonight I have mentioned just a few. As this campaign progresses, I will continue to evaluate the policies of the Carter Administration and elaborate on alternatives which I believe will begin to restore American security.

My views on foreign policy and national security are not based upon the latest opinion poll. They rest upon recent history as I read it; upon the realities of the world beyond our borders, as I see them; and particularly upon the nature of the Soviet Union, as it exists rather than as any of us would like it to exist.

⁴Reagan proposed the North American Accord in his November 13, 1979, television address announcing his candidacy for President; see Document 3.

6. Editorial Note

On May 1, 1980, Wall Street Journal reporters Albert Hunt and Thomas Bray interviewed Republican candidate for President Ronald Reagan aboard Reagan's campaign plane. After asking Reagan questions concerning fiscal and monetary policy and the most recent Republican presidential administrations, Hunt and Bray then turned to foreign policy. The previous week, the Jimmy Carter administration had launched a rescue operation to free the American hostages held in Iran. On April 25, Carter announced to the American public that the operation had been aborted, and that American casualties had ensued during the attempt. The reporters initiated the foreign policy segment of the interview by referencing these recent developments, asking: "WSJ: On the current situation in Iran. Do you think the most important issue or priority now is that of the hostages themselves, or the overall strategic situation in the area?"

Reagan replied: "Well, I don't think you can divorce the two. I think you have to weigh the importance of those hostages and their continuing being held, to what it means to the United States—the possible threat to the United States, and to other Americans, when seemingly someone with so little power can get away with a thing of this.

"Is anyone safe in an American Embassy anywhere?"

"That's why I just—I think that, you know, I just don't understand the President's words about now the burden isn't so great, it's as if, with this failed mission, is he washing his hands of it? Is he saying: 'Well, we'll continue to think about them, but there isn't anything we can do about them?'"

The reporters then asked: "Do you fear that the Iranians are either being driven or are moving more and more into the Soviet camp? And if so, what would you propose to do about that?"

Reagan replied: "Well, there's confusion about whether Khomeini feels this way; he's taken some action and made some statements that would appear that he does not want Soviet influence in there either.

"On the other hand there is no question of the Soviet influence with regard to the revolution to begin with, with that radio station across the border pumping away at the people with propaganda, with the presence of the Communist Party in Iran, which has been a factor."

The reporters asked: "If it became evident that they were, though, moving directly more into the Soviet camp, do you think the United States should take action, covert or overt, to stop that?"

Reagan responded: "I think the United States—we have to recognize, all of us, that this would be one of the most serious threats to the Middle East, and to our security and that of our allies, of anything that has been done so far.” The interview continued with questions about Cuba, defense spending, and U.S. allies, among other topics. 7. Editorial Note

On July 17, 1980, former Governor of California Ronald Reagan accepted the Republican nomination for President and addressed delegates at the Republican National Convention, held at the Joe Louis Arena in Detroit. In his acceptance speech, Reagan emphasized the connections between peace and security and pledged that his administration would protect the American people: “It is the responsibility of the President of the United States, in working for peace, to insure that the safety of our people cannot successfully be threatened by a hostile foreign power. As President, fulfilling that responsibility will be my Number One priority.

“We are not a warlike people. Quite the opposite. We always seek to live in peace. We resort to force infrequently and with great reluctance—and only after we have determined that it is absolutely necessary. We are awed—and rightly so—by the forces of destruction at loose in the world in this nuclear era. But neither can we be naive or foolish. Four times in my lifetime America has gone to war, bleeding the lives of its young men into the sands of beachheads, the fields of Europe and the jungles and rice paddies of Asia. We know only too well that war comes not when the forces of freedom are strong, but when they are weak. It is then that tyrants are tempted.

“Of all the objectives we seek, first and foremost is the establishment of lasting world peace. We must always stand ready to negotiate in good faith, ready to pursue any reasonable avenue that holds forth the promise of lessening tensions and furthering the prospects of peace. But let our friends and those who may wish us ill take note: the United States has an obligation to its citizens and to the people of the world never to let those who would destroy freedom dictate the future course of human life on this planet. I would regard my election as proof that we have renewed our resolve to preserve world peace and freedom. This nation will once again be strong enough to do that.” (Reagan Library, White House Office of Speechwriting, Research Office, 1980 Campaign File, Campaign and Pre-Presidential Speeches, 1979–1981, 07/13/1980, 07/14/1980, 07/17/1980 Acceptance Speech & 2 Press Statements)

The full text of the speech was printed in the New York Times and the Washington Post on July 18.

8. Address by Ronald Reagan¹

Chicago, August 18, 1980

[Omitted here are Reagan’s introductory remarks and the portion of his address dealing with the Veterans Administration.]

These are matters of great concern to your great organization. Let us turn now to a matter which vitally concerns our nation – “PEACE”.

It has always struck me as odd that you who have known at first-hand the ugliness and agony of war are so often blamed for war by those who parade for peace.

The truth is exactly the reverse. Having known war, you are in the forefront of those who know that peace is not obtained or preserved by wishing and weakness. You have consistently urged maintenance of a defense capability that provides a margin of safety for America. Today, that margin is disappearing.

But because of your support for military preparedness, there are those who equate that with being militant and desirous of war. The great American humorist, Will Rogers, had an answer for those who believed that strength invited war. He said, “I’ve never seen anyone insult Jack Dempsey.”

Richard Ciccone, “Reagan vows strong U.S.: VFW speech here opens campaign,” Chicago Tribune, August 19, 1980, pp. 1, 8. For additional information concerning the address, see Howell Raines, “Reagan Calls Arms Race Essential To Avoid a ‘Surrender’ or ‘Defeat’,” New York Times, pp. A1, D17, and Lou Cannon, “Reagan: ‘Peace Through Strength’,” Washington Post, pp. A1, A4; both August 19, 1980.

About 10 days ago, our new Secretary of State addressed a gathering on the West Coast.² He took me to task about American military strength. Indeed, he denounced the Republican Party for pledging to restore that margin of safety which the Carter Administration had allowed to evaporate. Actually, I've called for whatever it takes to be strong enough that no other nation will dare violate the peace. This is what we mean by superiority—nothing more, nothing less. The American people expect that the nation will remain secure; they have a right to security and we have an obligation to provide it. But Mr. Muskie was downright angry. He charged that such a policy would lead to an all-out arms race. Well, I have a message for him—one which he ignored for years as a Senator³ when he consistently voted against a strong national defense—we're already in an arms race, but only the Soviets are racing. They are outspending us in the military field by 50 percent and more than double, sometimes triple, on their strategic forces.

One wonders why the Carter Administration fails to see any threatening pattern in the Soviet presence, by way of Cuban proxies, in so much of Africa, which is the source of minerals absolutely essential to the industrialized democracies of Japan, Western Europe, and the U.S. We are self-sufficient in only 5 of the 27 minerals important to us industrially and strategically, and so the security of our resource life line is essential.

Then there is the Soviet Cuban and East German presence in Ethiopia, South Yemen, and now the invasion and subjugation of Afghanistan. This last step moves them within striking distance of the oil-rich Arabian Gulf. And is it just coincidence that Cuban and Soviet-trained terrorists are bringing civil war to Central American countries in close proximity to the rich oil fields of Venezuela and Mexico? All over the world, we can see that in the face of declining American power, the Soviets and their friends are advancing. Yet the Carter Administration seems totally oblivious.

² Reference is to Edmund Muskie, who became Secretary of State in May after Vance resigned following the abortive attempt to rescue the American hostages in Tehran. On August 7, Muskie delivered an address in Los Angeles before the United Steelworkers of America, asserting: "The world is an unruly place. The headlines will always reflect new crises and new challenges. But I'm tired of hearing the fear merchants who overstate the dangers and undersell America for their own political profit. Let's listen to the facts and not their fears." (Department of State Bulletin, September 1980, pp. A–C) The address is also printed in Foreign Relations, 1977–1980, vol. I, Foundations of Foreign Policy, Document 153. At a news conference following his remarks, Muskie stated "that his job was nonpolitical, even though he had told the steelworkers, 'I am the first political Secretary of State in a long time, and I intend to play that job.'" (Bernard Gwertzman, "Muskie, in Departure From Practice, Assails Republican Criticism," New York Times, August 8, 1980, pp. A1, A16) Excerpts from Muskie's news conference are printed in Department of State Bulletin, September 1980, pp. D–F. While in Los Angeles on August 7, the Secretary also addressed the G.I. Forum. The text of the address is ibid., pp. 14–16.

Clearly, world peace must be our number one priority. It is the first task of statecraft to preserve peace so that brave men need not die in battle. But it must not be peace at any price; it must not be a peace of humiliation and gradual surrender. Nor can it be the kind of peace imposed on Czechoslovakia by Soviet tanks just 12 years ago this month.⁴ And certainly it isn't the peace that came to Southeast Asia after the Paris Peace accords were signed.⁵

Peace must be such that freedom can flourish and justice prevail. Tens of thousands of boat people have shown us there is no freedom in the so-called peace in Vietnam. The hill people of Laos know poison gas, not justice, and in Cambodia there is only the peace of the grave for at least one-third of the population slaughtered by the Communists.

For too long, we have lived with the "Vietnam Syndrome." Much of that syndrome has been created by the North Vietnamese aggressors who now threaten the peaceful people of Thailand. Over and over they told us for nearly 10 years that we were the aggressors bent on imperialistic conquests. They had a plan. It was to win in the field of propaganda here in America what they could not win on the field of battle in Vietnam. As the years dragged on, we were told that peace would come if we would simply stop interfering and go home.

It is time we recognized that ours was, in truth, a noble cause. A small country newly free from colonial rule sought our help in establishing self-rule and the means of self-defense against a totalitarian neighbor bent on conquest. We dishonor the memory of 50,000 young Americans who died in that cause when we give way to feelings of guilt as if we were doing something shameful, and we have been shabby in our treatment of those who returned. They fought as well and as bravely as any Americans have ever fought in any war. They deserve our gratitude, our respect and our continuing concern.

There is a lesson for all of us in Vietnam. If we are forced to fight, we must have the means and the determination to prevail or we will not have what it takes to secure the peace. And while we are at it, let us tell those who fought in that war that we will never again ask young men to fight and possibly die in a war our government is afraid to let them win.

Shouldn't it be obvious to even the staunchest believer in unilateral disarmament as the sure road to peace that peace was never more

⁵ On January 27, 1973, in Paris, Secretary of State William Rogers signed the Agreement on Ending the War and Restoring Peace in Vietnam, commonly referred to as the Paris Peace Accords. certain than in the years following W.W. II when we had a margin of safety in our military power which was so unmistakable that others would not dare to challenge us?

The Korean tragedy was really not an exception to what I am saying, but a clear example of it. North Korea's attack on South Korea followed an injudicious statement from Washington that our sphere of interest in the Pacific and that our defense perimeter did not include Korea.⁶ Unfortunately, Korea also became our first "no win war," a portent of much that has happened since. But reflect for a moment how in those days the U.S. led free nations in other parts of the world to join together in recovering from the ravages of war. Our will and our capacity to preserve the peace were unchallenged. There was no question about our credibility and our welcome throughout the world. Our erstwhile enemies became close friends and allies, and we protected the peace from Berlin to Cuba.

When John F. Kennedy demanded the withdrawal of Soviet missiles from Cuba and the tension mounted in 1962, it was Nikita Khrushchev who backed down, and there was no war.⁷ It was because our strategic superiority over the Soviets was so decisive, by about a margin of 8 to 1.

But, then, in the face of such evidence that the cause of peace is best served by strength not bluster, an odd thing happened. Those responsible for our defense policy ignored the fact that some evidence of aggressive intent on the part of the Soviets was surely indicated by the placement of missiles in Cuba. We failed to heed the Soviet declaration that they would make sure they never had to back down again. No one could possibly misinterpret that declaration. It was an announcement of the Soviet intention to begin a military buildup, one which continues to this day.

Our policymakers, however, decided the Soviet Union would not attempt to catch us and that, for some reason, they would permanently accept second place as their proper position. Sometime later, in 1965, Secretary of Defense McNamara stated unequivocally that the Soviets were not attempting to compete with the U.S. on strategic Forces and were resigned to inferiority.

Fifteen years have passed since that exercise in self-delusion. At that time we led the Soviet Union in about 40 strategic military categories. Today, they lead us in all but 6 or 8 and may well surpass us in those if present trends continue.

Soviet leaders talk arrogantly of a so-called “correlation of forces” that has moved in their favor, opening up opportunities for them to extend their influence. The response from the administration in Washington has been one of weakness, inconsistency, vacillation and bluff. A Soviet combat brigade is discovered in Cuba; the Carter Administration declares its presence 90 miles off our shore as “unacceptable”.⁸ The brigade is still there. Soviet troops mass on the border of Afghanistan. The President issues a stern warning against any move by those troops to cross the border. They cross the border, execute the puppet President they themselves installed in 1978,⁹ and carry out a savage attack on the people of Afghanistan. Our credibility in the world slumps further. The President proclaims we’ll protect the Middle East by force of arms and 2 weeks later admits we don’t have the force.

Is it only Jimmy Carter’s lack of coherent policy that is the source of our difficulty? Is it his vacillation and his indecision? Or is there another, more frightening possibility—the possibility that this administration is being very consistent, that it is still guided by that same old doctrine that we have nothing to fear from the Soviets—if we just don’t provoke them.

Well, W.W. II came about without provocation. It came because nations were weak, not strong, in the face of aggression. Those same lessons of the past surely apply today. Firmness based on a strong defense capability is not provocative. But weakness can be provocative simply because it is tempting to a nation whose imperialist ambitions are virtually unlimited.

⁸ On August 31, 1979, the Department of State issued a statement that the United States had “recently confirmed the presence in Cuba of what appears to be a Soviet combat unit. This is the first time we have been able to confirm the presence of a Soviet ground forces unit on the island.” (Department of State Bulletin, October 1979, p. 63) On September 7, Carter spoke to reporters about the Soviet combat brigade, indicating: “The purpose of this combat unit is not yet clear. However, the Secretary of State spoke for me and for our Nation on Wednesday [September 5] when he said that we consider the presence of a Soviet combat brigade in Cuba to be a very serious matter and that this status quo is not acceptable.” (Public Papers: Carter, 1979, Book II, p. 1602) On October 1, Carter delivered an address to the nation concerning the troop presence. The text of the address is ibid., pp. 1802–1806. It is also printed in Foreign Relations, 1977–1980, vol. I, Foundations of Foreign Policy, Document 129. For additional information regarding U.S.-Soviet discussions, including oral and written exchanges about the brigade, see Foreign Relations, 1977–1980, vol. VI, Soviet Union, Documents 219, 221–224, and 226–228.

⁹ It is unclear whether Reagan is referring to Nur Muhammad Taraki, who served as President of Afghanistan from April 30, 1978, until he was assassinated on September 14, 1979, or Hafizullah Amin, who served as President from September 14 until he was assassinated on December 27, following the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan (see footnote 3, Document 4).

We find ourselves increasingly in a position of dangerous isolation. Our allies are losing confidence in us, and our adversaries no longer respect us.

There is an alternative path for America which offers a more realistic hope for peace, one which takes us on the course of restoring that vital margin of safety. For thirty years since the end of World War II, our strategy has been to preserve peace through strength. It is steadiness and the vision of men like Dwight Eisenhower that we have to thank for policies that made America strong and credible.

The last Republican defense budget, proposed by President Ford, would have maintained the margin.¹⁰

But the Carter Administration came to power on a promise of slashing America's defenses. It has made good on its promise.

Our program to restore the margin of safety must be prudent and measured. We must take a stand against terrorism in the world and combat it with firmness, for it is a most cowardly and savage violation of peace. We must regain that margin of safety I spoke of both in conventional arms and the deployment of troops. And we must allow no weakness in our strategic deterrent.

We do not stand alone in the world. We have Allies who are with us, who look to America to provide leadership and to remain strong. But they are confused by the lack of a coherent, principled, policy from the Carter Administration. And they must be consulted, not excluded from, matters which directly affect their own interest and security.

When we ignore our friends, when we do not lead, we weaken the unity and strength that binds our alliances. We must now reverse this dangerous trend and restore the confidence and cohesion of the alliance system on which our security ultimately rests.

There is something else. We must remember our heritage, who we are and what we are, and how this nation, this island of freedom, came into being. And we must make it unmistakably plain to all the world that we have no intention of compromising our principles, our beliefs or our freedom. Our reward will be world peace; there is no other way to have it.

For more than a decade, we have sought a detente. The word means relaxation. We don't talk about a detente with our allies; there is no tension there that needs relaxing. We seek to relax tensions where there are tensions—with potential enemies. And if those potential enemies are well armed and have shown a willingness to use armed force to gain their ends (for ends that are different from ours) then relaxing tensions is a delicate and dangerous but necessary business.

Detente has meaning only if both sides take positive actions to relax the tension. When one side relaxes while the other carries out the greatest military buildup in the history of mankind, the cause of peace has not been advanced.

Arms control negotiation can often help to improve stability but not when the negotiations are one-sided. And they obviously have been one-sided and will continue to be so if we lack steadiness and determination in keeping up our defenses.

I think continued negotiation with the Soviet Union is essential. We need never be afraid to negotiate as long as we remain true to our goals—the preservation of peace and freedom—and don't seek agreement just for the sake of having an agreement. It is important, also, that the Soviets know we are going about the business of restoring our margin of safety pending an agreement by both sides to limit various kinds of weapons.

I have repeatedly stated that I would be willing to negotiate an honest, verifiable reduction in nuclear weapons by both our countries to the point that neither of us represented a threat to the other. I cannot, however, agree to any treaty, including the SALT II treaty, which, in effect, legitimizes the continuation of a one-sided nuclear arms buildup.¹¹

We have an example in recent history of our ability to negotiate properly by keeping our objective clearly in mind until an agreement is reached. Back in the mid '50's, at the very height of the "cold war", Allied and Soviet military forces were still occupying Austria in a situation that was virtually a confrontation. We negotiated the Austrian State Treaty calling for the removal of all the occupying forces, Allied and Soviet.¹² If we had negotiated in the manner we've seen these last few years, Austria would still be a divided country.

¹¹ Carter and Brezhnev signed the Treaty Between the United States of America and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics on the Limitation of Strategic Offensive Arms and the Protocol to the Treaty during meetings held in Vienna June 15–18, 1979. The memoranda of conversation from the Vienna summit are printed in Foreign Relations, 1977–1980, vol. VI, Soviet Union, Documents 199–201, 203, 204, 206, and 207. XXXIII, SALT II, 1972–1980, Documents 241 and 242.

¹² On May 15, 1955, representatives of the governments of the Soviet Union, the United Kingdom, the United States, and France signed the Austrian State Treaty, which granted Austria independence and arranged for the withdrawal of all occupation forces. For information about the Vienna Ambassadorial Conference and the State Treaty, see Foreign Relations, 1955–1957, vol. The American people must be given a better understanding of the challenge to our security and of the need for effort and, yes, sacrifice to turn the situation around.

Our government must stop pretending that it has a choice between promoting the general welfare and providing for the common defense. Today they are one and the same.

Let our people be aware of the several objectives of Soviet strategy in this decade and the threat they represent to continued world peace. An attempt will be made to divide the NATO alliance and to separate, one at a time, our Allies and friends from the United States. Those efforts are clearly underway. Another objective I've already mentioned is an expansion of Soviet influence in the area of the Arabian Gulf and South Asia. Not much attention has been given to another move, and that is the attempt to encircle and neutralize the People's Republic of China. Much closer to home is Soviet-inspired trouble in the Caribbean. Subversion and Cuban-trained guerrilla bands are targeted on Jamaica, Honduras, El Salvador, and Guatemala. Leftist regimes have already taken over in Nicaragua and Grenada.¹³

A central concern of the Kremlin will always be the Soviet ability to handle a direct confrontation with our military forces. In a recent address, Paul Nitze said; "The Kremlin leaders do not want war; they want the world."¹⁴ For that reason, they have put much of their military effort into strategic nuclear programs. Here the balance has been moving against us and will continue to do so if we follow the course set by this administration.

The Soviets want peace and victory. We must understand this and what it means to us. They seek a superiority in military strength that, in the event of a confrontation, would leave us with an unacceptable choice between submission or conflict. Submission would give us peace alright—the peace of a Czechoslovakia or an Afghanistan. But if we have the will and the determination to restore the margin of safety which this Administration seems bent on losing, we can have real peace because we will never be faced with an ultimatum from anyone.

Indeed, the men in the Kremlin could in the face of such determination decide that true arms limitation makes sense.

¹⁴ The address is not identified. However, Nitze included this statement in an article entitled "Strategy in the Decade of the 1980s." (Foreign Affairs, vol. 59, number 1, Fall 1980)

Our best hope of persuading them to live in peace is to convince them they cannot win at war.

For a nation such as ours, arms are important only to prevent others from conquering us or our allies. We are not a belligerent people. Our purpose is not to prepare for war or wish harm to others. When we had great strength in the years following W.W. II, we used that strength not for territorial gain but to defend others.

Our foreign policy should be to show by example the greatness of our system and the strength of American ideals. The truth is we would like nothing better than to see the Russian people living in freedom and dignity instead of being trapped in a backwash of history as they are. The greatest fallacy of the Lenin-Marxist philosophy is that it is the “wave of the future.” Everything about it is primitive: compulsion in place of free initiative; coercion in place of law; militarism in place of trade; and empire-building in place of self-determination; and luxury for a chosen few at the expense of the many. We have seen nothing like it since the Age of Feudalism.

When people have had a free choice, where have they chosen Communism? What other system in the world has to build walls to keep its people in“?

Recently academician Andrei Sakharov, one of Russia’s great scientists and presently under house arrest, smuggled a statement out of the Soviet Union. It turned up in the New York Times Magazine of June 8, where Sakharov wrote: “I consider the United States the historically determined leader of the movement toward a pluralist and free society, vital to mankind.”¹⁵

He is right. We have strayed off course many times and we have been careless with the machinery of freedom bequeathed to us by the Founding Fathers, but, somehow, it has managed to survive our frailties. One of those Founding Fathers spoke the truth when he said “God intended America to be free.”

We have been a refuge for the persecuted and down-trodden from every corner of the world for 200 years. Today some of us are concerned by the latest influx of refugees, the boat people from Southeast Asia and from Cuba—all fleeing from the inhumanity of Communism. We worry about our capacity to care for them. I believe we must make a concerted effort to help them, and that others in the world should share in the responsibility.

But let’s do a better job of exporting Americanism. Let’s meet our responsibility to keep the peace at the same time we maintain without compromise our principles and ideals. Let's help the world eliminate the conditions which cause citizens to become refugees.

I believe it is our pre-ordained destiny to show all mankind that they, too, can be free without having to leave their native shore.

9. Statement by Ronald Reagan¹

Los Angeles, August 25, 1980

Ten days ago George Bush and I met with you here in Los Angeles on the occasion of his departure for Japan and China, a trip he undertook at my request.² As we stressed at the time, the purpose of the trip was to provide for a candid exchange of views with leaders in both countries on a wide range of international topics of mutual interest. Ambassador Bush returned last evening, and has reported his findings in detail.

We are both very pleased with the results of his extensive discussions. In a series of meetings with distinguished leaders in Japan, including Prime Minister Suzuki, Former Prime Ministers Fukuda, Kishi and Miki, Foreign Minister Itoh and Minister of International Trade and Industry Tanaka, he had the opportunity to hear their views and recommendations concerning the future of U.S.-Japanese relations.

Our Republican Party Platform stresses that Japan will remain a pillar of our policy for Asia, and a Reagan-Bush Administration will work hard to insure that U.S.-Japanese relations are maintained in excellent condition, based on close consultation and mutual understanding.

Japan's role in the process of insuring peace in Asia is a crucial one, and we must reinforce our ties with this close ally. Japan is our second most important trading partner, and we are her first. We have close ties in other fields, too. A most important example is the U.S.-Japan Mutual Security Treaty which recently marked its twentieth anniversary.³

Understanding the Japanese perspective is important for the success of American policy. As Ambassador Bush will tell you in detail, he found Japanese leaders unanimous in their view that the United States must be a strong, reliable, leading partner.

I appreciate receiving their views, and I am grateful to them for the courtesies extended to Ambassador Bush. I would also like to express my appreciation to, and regard for, U.S. Ambassador Mike Mansfield, who also extended many courtesies.

Of equal importance was Ambassador Bush's trip to China, where he held a series of high-level meetings. As I said on August 16, "we have an obvious interest in developing our relationship with China, an interest that goes beyond trade and cultural ties. It is an interest that is fundamental to a Reagan-Bush Administration."

The meetings in Beijing provided for extensive exchanges of views. George has reported to me in great detail the points of similarity and agreement, as well as those of dissimilarity and disagreement. Since the objective of the trip was to have just such an exchange without necessarily reaching agreement, I believe that the objective was reached.

We now have received an updated, first-hand of China's views, and the Chinese leaders have heard our point of view.

While in Beijing, Ambassador Bush and Richard Allen met at length with Vice Premier Deng Xiaoping, Foreign Minister Huang Hua, as well as with other top foreign policy experts and military leaders. I appreciate the courtesies which the Chinese leaders extended to our party, and I also wish to thank U.S. Ambassador Leonard Woodcock for his kind assistance.

We now maintain full and friendly diplomatic relations with China. This relationship began only a few years ago, and it is one which we should develop and strengthen in the years ahead. It is a delicate relationship, and the Reagan-Bush Administration will handle it with care and respect, with due regard for our own vital interests in the world generally, and in the Pacific region specifically.

China and the United States have a common interest in maintaining peace so that our nations can grow and prosper. Our two-way trade has now reached approximately $3.5 billion annually, and China's program of modernization depends in a major way on Western and U.S. technology.

Along with many other nations, we and China share a deep concern about the pace and scale of the Soviet military buildup. Chinese leaders agree with Japanese leaders that the United States must be a strong and vigorous defender of the peace, and they specifically favor us bolstering our defenses and our alliances.

It is quite clear that we do not see eye to eye on Taiwan. Thus, this is an appropriate time for me to state our position on this subject.

I'm sure that the Chinese leaders would place no value on our relations with them if they thought we would break commitments to them if a stronger power were to demand it. Based on my long-standing conviction that America can provide leadership and command respect only if it keeps its commitments to its friends, large and small, a Reagan-Bush Administration would observe these five principles in dealing with the China situation.

Guiding Principles for the Far East

First, U.S.-Chinese relations are important to American as well as Chinese interests. Our partnership should be global and strategic. In seeking improved relations with the People's Republic of China, I would extend the hand of friendship to all Chinese. In continuing our relations, which date from the historic opening created by President Nixon, I would continue the process of expanding trade, scientific and cultural ties.⁴

Second, I pledge to work for peace, stability and the economic growth of the Western Pacific area in cooperation with Japan, the People's Republic of China, the Republic of Korea and Taiwan.

Third, I will cooperate and consult with all countries of the area in a mutual effort to stand firm against aggression or search for hegemony which threaten the peace and stability of the area.

Fourth, I intend that United States relations with Taiwan will develop in accordance with the law of our land, the Taiwan Relations Act.⁵ This legislation is the product of our democratic process, and is designed to remedy the defects of the totally inadequate legislation proposed by Jimmy Carter.

By accepting China's three conditions for "normalization,"⁶ Jimmy Carter made concessions that Presidents Nixon and Ford had steadfastly refused to make. I was and am critical of his decision because I believe he made concessions that were not necessary and not in our national interest. I felt that a condition of normalization—by itself a sound policy choice—should have been the retention of a liaison office on Taiwan of equivalent status to the one which we had earlier established in Beijing. With a persistent and principled negotiating position, I believe that normalization could ultimately have been achieved on this basis. But that is behind us now. My present concern is to safeguard the interests of the United States and to enforce the law of the land.

It was the timely action of the Congress, reflecting the strong support of the American people for Taiwan, that forced the changes in the inadequate bill which Mr. Carter proposed. Clearly, the Congress was unwilling to buy the Carter plan, which it believed would have jeopardized Taiwan's security.

This Act, designed by the Congress to provide adequate safeguards for Taiwan's security and well being, also provides the official basis for our relations with our long-time friend and ally. It declares our official policy to be one of maintaining peace and promoting extensive, close, and friendly relations between the United States and the seventeen million people on Taiwan as well as the one billion people on the China mainland. It specifies that our official policy considers any effort to determine the future of Taiwan by other than peaceful means a threat to peace and of "grave concern" to the United States.

And, most important, it spells out our policy of providing defensive weapons to Taiwan and mandates the United States to maintain the means to “resist any resort to force or other forms of coercion” which threaten the security or the social or economic system of Taiwan.

This Act further spells out, in great detail, how the President of the United States, our highest elected official, shall conduct relations with Taiwan, leaving to his discretion the specific methods of achieving policy objectives. The Act further details how our official personnel (including diplomats) are to administer United States relations with Taiwan through the American Institute in Taiwan. It specifies that for that purpose they are to resign for the term of their duty in Taiwan and then be reinstated to their former agencies of the U.S. government with no loss of status, seniority or pension rights.

The intent of the Congress is crystal clear. Our official relations with Taiwan will be funded by Congress with public monies, the expenditure of which will be audited by the Comptroller General of the United States; and Congressional oversight will be performed by two standing Committees of the Congress.

You might ask what I would do differently. I would not pretend, as Carter does, that the relationship we now have with Taiwan, enacted by our Congress, is not official.

I am satisfied that this Act provides an official and adequate basis for safeguarding our relationship with Taiwan, and I pledge to enforce it. But I will eliminate petty practices of the Carter Administration which are inappropriate and demeaning to our Chinese friends on Taiwan. For example, it is absurd and not required by the Act that our representatives are not permitted to meet with Taiwanese officials in their offices and ours. I will treat all Chinese officials with fairness and dignity.

I would not impose restrictions which are not required by the Taiwan Relations Act and which contravene its spirit and purpose. Here are other examples of how Carter has gone out of his way to humiliate our friends on Taiwan:

- Taiwanese officials are ignored at senior levels of the U.S. government.
- The Taiwan Relations Act specifically requires that the Taiwanese be permitted to keep the same number of offices in this country as they had before. Previously, Taiwan had 14 such offices. Today there are but nine.
- Taiwanese military officers are no longer permitted to train in the United States or to attend service academies.
- Recently the Carter Administration attempted to ban all imports from Taiwan labeled “Made in the Republic of China,” but was forced to rescind the order after opposition began to mount in the Congress.

- The Carter Administration unilaterally imposed a one-year moratorium on arms supplies⁷ even though the Act specifies that Taiwan shall be provided with arms of a defense character.

- The Carter Administration abrogated the Civil Aviation Agreement with Taiwan, which had been in effect since 1947, in response to demands from the People's Republic of China.

I recognize that the People's Republic of China is not pleased with the Taiwan Relations Act which the United States Congress insisted on as the official basis for our relations with Taiwan. This was made abundantly clear to Mr. Bush, and, I'm told, is clear to the Carter Administration. But it is the law of our land.

Fifth, as President I will not accept the interference of any foreign power in the process of protecting American interests and carrying out the laws of our land. To do otherwise would be a dereliction of my duty as President.

It is my conclusion that the strict observance of these five principles will be in the best interests of the United States, the People's Republic of China and the people on Taiwan.

The specific implementation of these duties will have to await the results of the election in November, but in deciding what to do I will take into account the views of the People's Republic of China as well as Taiwan. It will be my firm intention to preserve the interests of the United States, and as President I will choose the methods by which this shall best be accomplished.

10. Address by George Bush¹

San Francisco, September 11, 1980

I welcome this opportunity to appear again before one of America's most distinguished public forums.

It was in a speech to the Commonwealth Club of San Francisco in 1932 that Franklin Roosevelt promised that if elected he'd balance the budget.²

Four years later, President Roosevelt was scheduled to make a campaign appearance here. Considering the fact that his administration's budget wasn't balanced, he asked his speechwriter, Sam Rosenman, how to deal with that little problem.

According to the story, Judge Rosenman told his boss that under the circumstances there was only one effective political response, which was: "Deny you ever made that speech."

For those who question whether that happens to be a partisan revisionist version of history, my source is Ed Costikyan, a prominent New York Democratic leader. And my purpose in telling the story is simply to make the point that the Commonwealth Club has a long tradition in helping to shape issues in American presidential campaigns.

When a candidate for national office says something here, it's likely to be noted—and remembered.

With that in mind, today I want to address the issue of preserving the peace in an era of unprecedented danger to our country and to the cause of freedom throughout the world.

As Governor Reagan's running mate, let me say that I'm not unaware of the fact that a week ago Vice President Mondale appeared at this podium to offer the administration's view of the scope of that danger and of our country's ability to meet it.³

Bush spoke at the St. Francis Hotel before members of the Commonwealth Club at noon PDT. For press reports on the address, see Philip Shabecoff, "Bush Strives to Draw Attention to Reagan's Policies, Not to Himself," New York Times, September 13, 1980, p. 10, and Felicity Barringer, "Bush Cheers the Gray, White and Gold," Washington Post, September 12, 1980, p. A4.

³ Reference is to Mondale's September 5 speech before the Commonwealth Club. See Richard D. Lyons, "Mondale Presses Party Unity Message in California: A Drive to Get Out the Vote," New York Times, September 6, 1980, p. 8.

However, my remarks today aren't intended as a response to the Vice President's presentation of the Carter administration's foreign policy view, but rather of its record.

Mr. Mondale's speech accurately reflected the administration's current campaign perspective regarding foreign policy. The administration's record, on the other hand—from 1977 to the present—is quite another matter.

In fact, on reading reports of the Vice President's address to the Commonwealth Club, I got the distinct impression that to some extent he was following Sam Rosenman's advice to FDR. That is, he was ignoring—if not denying—the unpleasant realities of America's weakened posture in the world after three-and-a-half years of the Carter Presidency.

I can understand that. After all, from time immemorial, the general rule in political campaigning has been: "If you're handed a lemon, make a lemonade."

What I can't understand, however—more specifically, what I find hard to condone—is the campaign being waged by high-level spokesmen for the Carter administration to cloud the foreign policy issue behind a smokescreen of rhetoric that misrepresents Ronald Reagan's commitment to peace.

Let me bluntly describe the aim of that campaign: It is apparent—indeed, it's been publicly stated by those handling the administration's re-election effort—that their objective is to portray Ronald Reagan as a man who, as President, might lead our country into war.

And now, having said that, let me answer this campaign charge in equally uncertain terms: It is a false and irresponsible distortion of Ronald Reagan's views, as well as his lifelong record as a citizen and public servant.

As Governor of your state for eight years, Ronald Reagan proved strong in his commitment to human betterment and sensitive to the people's interests and desires.

The American people, now as always, desire peace.

We want peace with freedom—peace with dignity—not only for ourselves but for men and women everywhere.

We want peace within a framework of international understanding that recognizes human rights.

And in that regard, let me again speak to the point by saying something that's been on my mind for quite a while:

The administration in power—regardless of what you might have heard from this podium last week—did not invent human rights. Jimmy Carter did not invent morality in foreign policy.

When the subject at hand is preserving the peace—when the subject is freedom with dignity—then no candidate and no political party has a monopoly on human compassion.

Moreover, a campaign that deals in personalities and innuendo is no substitute in a free society for full and fair debate on the issues.

Ronald Reagan welcomes such a debate—on his record and on those of his opponents.

Ronald Reagan is ready and willing to meet President Carter and Congressman Anderson⁴ in a full public discussion of the questions that concern the American people—including the overriding issue of preserving American freedom in a troubled world.

Let's hope that President Carter reverses his position and sees fit in the end to take part in such a debate.⁵ I know that Governor Reagan shares that hope, for a debate among the Presidential candidates this election year would clear the air—and dissolve the smokescreen—regarding their differences on how to achieve a stable, prosperous economy here at home and a lasting peace throughout the world.

In terms of our American foreign policy, what are the real differences between Ronald Reagan and his opponents in this race—the differences that might be aired if President Carter changes his mind, accepts the will of the people, and consents to a debate-on-the-record?

Let me offer a broad overview on one of the most important of these differences—what a Reagan Presidency would bring to America's foreign policy and our quest for peace.

First, with Ronald Reagan in the White House, it would mean that our country would continue to press forward in order to achieve a strategic arms limitation treaty with the Soviet Union—but he would not enter into an inequitable treaty; a treaty that locks in advantage for the Soviets; a treaty that cannot be properly verified.

Under a Reagan administration, we are not going to risk American security on the word of a nation that has time and again broken its international commitments.

A true, not illusory, relaxation of tensions with the Soviets can only be based on mutual respect between the world's two super-powers and a realistic assessment on our part of Soviet intentions in light of their past record.

Which leads to my second point regarding the meaning of a Reagan Presidency to our country's foreign policy and quest for world peace.

In Ronald Reagan, America will have a President who understands—and has long understood—the true nature of Soviet intentions.

It didn't take the invasion of Afghanistan last year to teach Governor Reagan the facts of geopolitical life where Soviet leadership is concerned.⁶

As President, Ronald Reagan will negotiate with the Soviets not only from strength but from understanding—two qualities sadly, indeed tragically, lacking in our dealings with the Soviets and other nations of the world over the past three-and-a-half years.

Third, a Reagan Presidency will mean that we'll have a Commander-in-Chief in the White House who also understands that while rhetoric may be an effective instrument in domestic politics, it is no substitute for real, substantial strength in meeting our country's national security interests around the world.

The deterrent power of our Army, our Navy, our Air Force and our strategic arms has not kept pace with the expansion of Soviet military power over the past three-and-a-half years—Vice President Mondale's Pollyanna optimism notwithstanding. Even if the present administration were to succeed in fooling the American people in this regard—which I don't for a moment believe it will—the Soviets are not being fooled.

Our Defense Department may leak, then confirm, classified information about an "invisible" bomber.⁷

⁶ See footnote 3, Document 4.

⁷ Presumable reference to the "Stealth" bomber. In an August 14 article, Washington Post reporter George Wilson indicated that Carter planned to "commit himself to developing a new strategic bomber" that, as a result of technological innovations, would "foil Soviet defenses": "One key breakthrough is a top-secret way to make a long-range bomber virtually invisible to enemy radar used to detect invading aircraft and aim guns and missiles at them." (George C. Wilson, "Carter to Support New U.S. Bomber," Washington Post, August 14, 1980, p. A1) During an informal exchange with reporters in Perth Amboy, New Jersey, on September 9, Carter characterized allegations that his administration had improperly released information about the project as "absolutely irresponsible and false," and asserted that "the only thing that has been revealed about the Stealth development, which is a major technological evolutionary development for our country, is the existence of the program itself." He noted that the Stealth program's existence was unclassified as of January 1977 and that his administration had taken "an unclassified program under the previous Republican administration, classified it, and have been successful for 3 years in keeping the entire system secret." (Public Papers: Carter, 1980–81, Book II, pp. 1687–1688)

This administration may, by implication, claim credit for such a bomber.

But the “invisible” American bomber that the Soviets are most aware of is the B–1, which would have been operative had this administration followed President Ford’s lead in recommending its construction.⁸

A Reagan foreign policy will be one that returns to the proven principle that the only peace that can be lasting is one based on the strength to deter aggression.

Fourth, a Reagan foreign policy will be one of competence and consistency—not zig-zag diplomacy that leaves our foreign friends and allies and even our own State Department in disarray and confusion.

Too many times in the past three-and-a-half years we have witnessed the appalling spectacle of the leading nation of the Free World jolting its allies with sudden shifts in policy—such as occurred when the President reversed his position on the neutron bomb, leaving West German Chancellor Helmut Schmidt out on a policy limb.⁹

Along the same diplomatic policy line, a Reagan Presidency will find our State Department and our Ambassador at the United Nations not only communicating with each other, but in agreement on those votes which affect the security interests of our staunch ally, Israel.

Fifth, a Reagan foreign policy will restore our country’s economic strength overseas by stabilizing the value of the dollar here at home. That means curbing the skyrocketing inflation of recent years by holding down the growth of spending and by increasing productivity that has precipitously declined under Jimmy Carter.

We are going to make America work again by letting America work again.

It’s time we freed American business and industry from the fetters of excessive federal regulations.

Finally, let me conclude this brief overview of what a Reagan Presidency will mean for America’s quest for peace by alluding to the indispensable quality needed to make any American foreign policy successful—a quality dependent on but yet transcending military and economic strength, as well as diplomatic skill.

I mean the quality of respect.

With Ronald Reagan as President, the men and women who represent our country overseas will be secure in the knowledge that their country will protect them in American embassies.

Never again a Teheran!

With Ronald Reagan as President, America will once again be respected around the world—and we will earn that respect not only because we are true to our word but because we in turn respect the rights and customs of other freedom-loving nations and cultures.

That is the ultimate meaning of a Reagan Presidency—an America both compassionate and strong—an America that cares for its citizens—for its heritage—for the future, not only of our own society but of societies everywhere made up of men and women who cherish the cause of freedom and human dignity in a world at peace.

11. Editorial Note

On September 25, 1980, Republican Vice Presidential nominee George H.W. Bush delivered a statement before the World Affairs Council in Philadelphia. The Reagan-Bush Committee prepared a news release, containing the statement text, for release at noon that day. In his statement, Bush provided an overview of post-World War II U.S. policy in the Persian Gulf region, asserting that President Jimmy Carter's "vacillating, ineffective conduct of America's foreign relations" had undermined the bipartisan foreign policy of his predecessors. After criticizing Carter's approach to the Soviet Union and American hostages in Iran, Bush asserted that Republican Presidential nominee Ronald Reagan would undertake significant change, adding that the change would be "not military but moral.

"The Carter Administration has said a great deal in recent years about international morality. Yet this President has by word and action overlooked the most fundamental tenet of a moral foreign policy—keeping your word.

“Under a Reagan foreign policy, America will once again be recognized throughout the world—by ally, neutral and adversary alike—as a nation that keeps its word.

“Our friends must be able to depend on us. Our adversaries must know that when America speaks in foreign affairs, it means what it says in terms of what is ‘acceptable’ and ‘unacceptable’ to our national interest.

“A Reagan foreign policy will also operate on a single standard of morality in its dealings with other countries. To condemn violations of human rights in non-communist countries but remain silent in the face of crimes against humanity in Communist-dominated countries like Cambodia, Cuba and more recently, Nicaragua, is a form of diplomatic hypocrisy that may meet President Carter’s foreign policy standards, but will not meet President Reagan’s.

“Keeping our word as a nation—that’s the first step toward re-establishing respect for America overseas. And by respect, I don’t mean fear of military might. I mean the belief on the part of people throughout the world, and their leaders, that the United States is true to its ideals—the ideals of universal peace, freedom and justice that would form the cornerstone of President Reagan’s foreign policy.

“Advancing those ideals in the world as it is—not as we wish it to be—would be beyond the power of the best-intentioned President, however, if that President were forced to deal with the Soviets and other adversaries from a position of weakness.

“That is the self-created trap that President Carter now finds himself in whenever he tries to deter the Soviets from expansionist ventures—whether in Cuba or Afghanistan.

“The lesson is clear: an American President, regardless of his good intentions, can’t deter aggression by empty threats—as this President has tried to do.”

Bush then explained how a Reagan administration would restore America’s deterrent power before underscoring the objectives for doing so: “Our aim in this will not be to engage the Soviets in an arms race. Rather, it will be to discourage the Soviets from endangering the peace through reckless actions brought on by the Russians’ perception of the United States as a nation too weak, both morally and materially, to defend its interests.

“Once the Soviets understand that this is a misconception—once the leaders in the Kremlin come to see and hear the actions and words of an American President, Ronald Reagan, dedicated to restoring our nation’s moral and material strength—then and only then can we look to a day when a real, not an illusory, disarmament treaty can be reached—when substantial negotiations can be entered into with the Soviets, based on a mutual interest in peaceful solutions to outstanding differences between our countries—when the threat of war recedes from the horizon of great power relations—and when the age-old dream of a world of peace, freedom and justice can be realized.

“That is the new beginning in foreign policy we can look for in a Reagan Presidency. It is the road to peace and the preservation not only of our country’s interests but our highest ideals as we move into the decade of the Eighties and beyond.” (Reagan Library, White House Office of Speechwriting, Research Office, 1980 Campaign File, Campaign and Pre-Presidential Speeches, 1979–1981, 09/25/1980 George Bush—World Affairs Council)

12. Editorial Note

On September 30, 1980, Republican Presidential candidate Ronald Reagan took part in an Associated Press (AP) interview in New York. Reagan answered questions about both foreign and domestic politics, including questions related to the second Strategic Arms Limitation Treaty (SALT II), signed by President Jimmy Carter and Soviet leader Leonid Brezhnev on June 18, 1979.

The interviewer asked: “If you were elected, would you withdraw the SALT II treaty from Senate consideration?”

Reagan responded: “Yes. But, at the same time I did, I would make it plain that I was prepared to sit down with the Russians for as long as it might take to negotiate a legitimate arms limitation agreement. My objection to SALT II is it is not arms limitation. It legitimizes [the] arms race. It begins by letting the Soviet Union build 3,000 more warheads, then we can build some to catch up on, only we can’t catch up until 1990. I think it is a fatally flawed treaty, and it isn’t arms limitation. If we’re really going to try to remove the danger to the world today, let’s sit down with the intention voiced and the agreement of the other side that we’re going to find a way to fairly reduce the strategic weapons so that neither one of us can threaten the other.”

The interviewer continued, "To parity, to equality?"

Reagan answered: "To whatever is necessary that we cannot be a threat to each other."

Reagan also answered a broader follow-up question concerning arms talks with the Soviet Union: "Would you want to begin arms talks with the Soviet Union at the present military strength, or would you want to wait until the United States was able to build up its strength to a point where you thought there was military parity with the Soviet Union?"

He replied, "I'd have to look to see whether it would be sufficient just for us to start, but I don't think that we should sit at the table the way we have in the past. This is one of the things that's been wrong. We have been unilaterally disarming at the same time we're negotiating supposedly arms limitation with the other fellow, where all he has to do is sit there and not give up anything and his superiority increases. He will be far more inclined to negotiate in good faith if he knows that the United States is engaged in building up its military."

The interviewer responded, "So you wouldn't wait to start new negotiations?"

Reagan commented, "No, I think that if you start, they know our industrial strength. They know our capacity. The one card that's been missing in these negotiations has been the possibility of an arms race. Now the Soviets have been racing, but with no competition. No one else is racing. Now they know the difference between their industrial power and ours. And so I think that we'd get a lot farther at the table if they know that as they continue, they're faced with our industrial capacity and all that we can do."

The interviewer then asked: "Would an absolute reduction in the existing levels of arms in the United States and Soviet Union be a requirement for a treaty?"

Reagan answered: "It's either that or a buildup on our side to the point that once again the possibility of a preemptive strike has been eliminated."

The interviewer continued: "The theory behind the treaty that the President submitted was that you put a lid somewhere, even on the increase. But you seem to be saying that you want an absolute reduction."

Reagan responded: "The only choice between that then would be parity by our matching what we know them to have. And it would, I think, make a lot more sense for both our countries to reduce it down."

The interviewer asked: "It would have to be a Soviet reduction to our level," to which Reagan stated: "Yes."

The interviewer then asked: “Given the hard line that you’ve taken with the Soviet Union and the political realities in the Kremlin, how long do you think it would take to convince the Soviet Union to come to the bargaining table?”

Reagan responded: “Well, I don’t know, the Soviet Union wouldn’t be confused about where I stood, and I think sometimes they’d feel better if they know what the game is and who the players are.” (“Excerpts From Reagan Interview on Policies He Would Follow,” New York Times, October 2, 1980, page B13)

13. Editorial Note

Republican Presidential candidate Ronald Reagan called for a renewed emphasis on “the fundamental principles” of U.S. human rights policy in a statement released on October 17, 1980. Noting that representatives of 35 countries were in Madrid to prepare for a follow-up meeting of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe (CSCE), Reagan acknowledged the importance of “the protection and enhancement of freedom and human rights for all,” yet asserted that “the United States will not succeed in its human rights policy unless we keep in mind that its guiding ideas must be uniquely American. These principles, of political and economic freedom, justice, equal protection, and fairness, which have inspired so many people, are rooted deep in our history.

“Indeed, it was these principles that helped guide our founding fathers as they led an infant country through revolution and to independence. It was these principles that are now embodied in our great freedom documents: the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution. And it is these principles that have become, in my opinion, America’s greatest contribution to political thought and action throughout the world.”

The Jimmy Carter administration, Reagan asserted, had “never successfully used America’s invaluable philosophical resources,” and had failed to live up to its promise to prioritize human rights in a number of instances. After noting several such failures in the cases of the Soviet Union, Poland, Cambodia, and Iran, Reagan stated: “This is not a human rights policy. This is not in the tradition of America’s great freedom principles. Instead, this is gross hypocrisy—boasting of human rights at home while being intimidated by violators of human rights abroad.”

“To effectively fulfill the Helsinki Accords,” concluded by the CSCE in 1975, Reagan continued, “we need a vigorous and consistent human rights policy. Yet at the last review conference in 1977, the Carter administration, though speaking boldly to the public, spoke timidly to the Soviets. The signal must have been clear to the Soviet leaders: Carter’s human rights policy toward the Soviet empire and its captive nations was meant only for domestic political consumption.

“Perhaps the most important way to promote the cause of human rights is to spread the American message of freedom and hope abroad. We must break through the news blackout surrounding the oppressed peoples of the world, to tell them the truth about the American freedom values.

“Unfortunately, the Carter administration does not understand the power of this message. Its support for our cultural and informational programs has declined over the last four years, while the misinformation and propaganda programs of our adversaries have grown. Nor has it focused world attention on the flagrant violations of the Helsinki Accords by the Soviet Union, such as when the Soviet Union resumed jamming Voice of America radio broadcasts to prevent the peoples under its control from hearing of the courageous Polish workers and their struggle. America in effect ratified this blatant act of hypocrisy.

“We must continue to uphold the historical traditions of freedom and justice to which free people everywhere might look. The American human rights legacy should remain unconditional and consistent. The world expects—and deserves—no less.” (News release, October 17; Reagan Library, White House Office of Speechwriting, Research Office, 1980 Campaign File, Campaign and Pre-Presidential Speeches, 1979–1981, 10/17/1980 Statements on Human Rights and Helsinki Accords)

14. Address by Ronald Reagan¹

Arlington, Virginia, October 19, 1980

A STRATEGY OF PEACE FOR THE '80S

Good evening.

Three months ago, in accepting the nomination of my party to be its presidential candidate, I said: "Of all the objectives we seek, first and foremost is the establishment of lasting world peace."²

Since I spoke those words, I have had the chance to visit with Americans like you, all across the nation. I have brought that same message of peace as our primary goal.

But it hasn't all been one-sided. I have had the chance not only to talk with you but also to listen to you about the course you believe our country should take. We have, in a way, been holding a national conversation together on the future of our country.

Tonight, I want to continue my part of that ongoing conversation, and offer what I believe are ways in which peace can be assured for every American family and for the world.

But before I do, I'd like to speak to you for a few moments now, not as a candidate for the presidency, but as a citizen, a parent—in fact, a grandparent—who shares with you the deep and abiding hope for peace.

I revere, as I know you do, the American tradition of free and reasoned discussion of our complex issues. That is why I have participated in six debates since I became a candidate for President.³ And that is why I have stated my willingness to engage President Carter in his first debate.⁴

The great tradition of reasoned exchange of views has not exactly characterized all the rhetoric of this campaign. My own views have been distorted in what I can only conclude is an effort to scare people through innuendoes and misstatements of my positions.

Possibly Mr. Carter is gambling that his long litany of fear will somehow influence enough voters to save him from the inevitable consequences of the policies of his administration which have brought so much human misery.

I am confident he will lose that gamble. I think the American people know—to paraphrase Franklin Roosevelt—that the only thing the cause of peace has to fear is fear itself.⁵

Let us base our decisions about peace and security on the facts, on what we need to know and not on what we are told we must fear.

There can be no doubt about what is the major issue in this campaign concerning the question of peace.

It is whether you believe Mr. Carter's words and deeds have brought the United States closer to or further away from the goal of peace based on confidence in the strength of our nation.

As a presidential candidate four years ago, he said: “. . . it is imperative that the world know that we will meet obligations and commitments to our allies and that we will keep our nation strong.”⁶

Did he keep his promise? That's the real peace issue in 1980. And that's an issue for you to decide. Has he kept our nation strong? Are you willing to risk four more years of what we have now? Has the registration and the possible draft of your sons and daughters contributed to your peace of mind? Is the world safer for you and your family?

Whatever else history may say about my candidacy, I hope it will be recorded that I appealed to our best hopes, not our worst fears, to our confidence rather than our doubts, to the facts, and not to fantasies.

⁴ Reagan ultimately agreed to debate Carter without Anderson present. The League of Women Voters then extended an invitation for Carter and Reagan to participate in a televised debate scheduled to take place in Cleveland on October 28. (Hedrick Smith, “Reagan, in a Shift, Agrees to a Debate With Carter Alone; League Invitation for Oct. 28; Details Are Not Firm on a Meeting—Strauss Says President is Ready to Face His Rival,” New York Times, October 18, 1980, pp. 1, 8) For the transcript of the debate, moderated by Howard K. Smith, see Public Papers: Carter, 1980–81, Book III, pp. 2476–2502.

⁵ Reference is to Roosevelt's March 4, 1933, inaugural address.

⁶ Reference is to Carter's August 24, 1976, address before the American Legion Convention in Seattle. Carter stated, “I would never again see our country become militarily involved in the internal affairs of another country unless our own security was directly threatened. But it is imperative that the world know that we will meet obligations and commitments to our allies and that we will keep our nation strong.” (The Presidential Campaign 1976, vol. 1, part I: Jimmy Carter, p. 512)

And these three—hope, confidence, and facts—are at the heart of my vision of peace.

We have heard the phrase “peace through strength” so often, its meaning has become blurred through overuse.

The time has come for America to recall once more the basic truths behind the familiar words.

Peace is made by the fact of strength—economic, military, and strategic.

Peace is lost when such strength disappears or—just as bad—is seen by an adversary as disappearing.

We must build peace upon strength. There is no other way. And the cold, hard fact of the matter is that our economic, military, and strategic strength under President Carter is eroding.

Only if we are strong will peace be strong.

Throughout Scripture, we see reference to peace-makers—those who through their actions—not just their words—take the material of this imperfect world and, with hard work and God’s help, fashion from that material peace for the world.

In recent weeks you’ve been hearing from a lot of other people as to what they say I believe about peace. Well, tonight let me tell you what I believe.

Understanding of how peace is obtained—through competence, and hard work, confidence, and patience—must guide and inspire this nation in the years ahead.

And at the center of such peace-making is the need to restore our historic American tradition of bipartisanship.

The cause of peace knows no party. The cause of peace transcends personal ambition. The cause of peace demands appeals for unity, not appeals to divisiveness.

These are truisms—which Mr. Carter has forgotten—or chosen to ignore.

Senator Ted Kennedy said earlier this year, in reference to him, that “no president should be reelected because he happened to be standing there when his foreign policy collapsed around him.”⁷

I cannot believe this administration’s defense policies reflect the thinking of millions of rank-and-file Democrat party members.

The Carter administration, dominated as it is by the McGovernite wing of the party, has broken sharply with the views and policies of Harry Truman, John Kennedy, and many contemporary Democratic leaders.

A great American tradition of bipartisanship—where domestic political differences end at the water’s edge—has been lost at a time when we are faced with growing instability and crisis abroad. I believe the bipartisan tradition is too deep and sound to be destroyed by one man in the space of four years, but still, damage has been done and it will take a determined effort to repair it.

I pledge, if elected President, to take every step necessary to restore the bipartisan tradition in American national security and foreign policy; to work with congressional leaders of both parties to design and conduct a truly bipartisan tradition in American national security and foreign policy. And, I intend to have this bipartisan spirit reflected during my presidency in key foreign and defense policy appointive positions. As in the past, our domestic differences will end at the water’s edge.

In the next few minutes, I would like to outline for you nine specific steps that I will take to put America on a sound, secure footing in the international arena. Working closely with the Congress, I propose to accomplish these steps with the support of an informed American public. Here are the steps:

1. An improved policy-making structure;
2. A clear approach to East-West relations;
3. A realistic policy toward our own Hemisphere;
4. A plan to assist African and Third World development;
5. A plan to send our message abroad;
6. A realistic strategic arms reduction policy;
7. A determined effort to strengthen the quality of our armed services;
8. Combatting international terrorism;
9. Restoration of a margin of safety in our defense planning.

Reorganizing the Policy-Making Structure

The present administration has been unable to speak with one voice in foreign policy. This must change. My administration will restore leadership to U.S. foreign policy by organizing it in a more coherent way.

An early priority will be to make structural changes in the foreign policy-making machinery so that the Secretary of State will be the President’s principal spokesman and adviser.

The National Security Council will once again be the coordinator of the policy process. Its mission will be to assure that the President receives an orderly, balanced flow of information and analysis. The National Security Adviser will work closely in teamwork with the Secretary of State and the other members of the Council.

My goal also will be to build and utilize a diplomatic corps with language proficiency, and organizational and professional skills, and to insure the safety of our representatives on duty overseas. We can restore pride and effectiveness in our foreign policy establishment by putting an end to the kidnapping and murder of our public servants in service abroad.

Relations with Friends and Adversaries

With effective machinery in place, we must first address the conduct of our relations with our allies, with the Soviet Union, and with the People's Republic of China.

Confidence and trust in the United States has fallen to an all-time low. This must be reversed. The United States has an important leadership role, and this role can be effective only if our alliances are cemented by unity of purpose and mutual respect.

Worldwide, our allies are stronger, most are robust and healthy. But the challenge of the 1980s is to assemble that strength in a manner which allows us to pursue the objective of peace together. If our alliances are divided, only our adversaries benefit.

With our allies, we can conduct a realistic and balanced policy toward the Soviet Union. I am convinced that the careful management of our relationship with the Soviet Union depends on a principled, consistent American foreign policy. We seek neither confrontation nor conflict, but to avoid both, we must remain strong and determined to protect our interests.

Our relationship with the People's Republic of China is in its beginning stages. It is one that can and will grow, and I repeat my intention to assist its rapid growth. There is an historic bond of friendship between the American and Chinese peoples, and I will work to amplify it wherever possible. Expanded trade, cultural contact and other arrangements will all serve the cause of preserving and extending the ties between our two countries.

A Realistic Policy for the Western Hemisphere

No area of the world should have a higher priority than the place where we live, the Western Hemisphere. My administration will forge a new, more realistic policy toward our own Hemisphere as an integral part of my program for peace.

In four years, Mr. Carter's administration has managed to alienate our friends in the Hemisphere, to encourage the destabilization of governments, and to permit Cuban and Soviet influence to grow.

We must take steps to change the Carter administration's sorry record of vacillation, alienation, and neglect in the region.

Our relations must be solidly based on shared economic and security interests, not upon mutual recrimination and insult.

We will initiate a program of intensive economic development with cooperating countries in the Caribbean. Many of these countries were given their independence and then promptly forgotten. In their natural resentment, some have turned to extremist models—fertile ground for Cuban meddling. Our programs will assist them both financially and technically to make the best use of their resources in agriculture, industry, and tourism.

Closer to home, I have spoken before of my belief that we should work toward a North American Accord⁸ with our immediate neighbors, Mexico and Canada. This would take the form of broadened, more open lines of communication between us to seek ways in which we can strengthen our traditional friendship. If Canada and Mexico are stronger, our entire Hemisphere benefits.

A Policy to Assist African and Third World Development

Our relationship with what has often been called the "Third World" must form an important part of any program for peace. A strong American economy and the spirit of our free enterprise system have a great deal to offer the poorer, less developed nations of the world. Africans, for example, look to us and our industrial allies for the dominant share of their export markets, for their investment capital, for official aid, and for technical know-how.

Yet, the flow of American investment to Africa continues at only a trickle, and our export promotion has been neglected.

My administration will recognize that investment from the private sector—know-how, technology, and marketing assistance—is the key to African development. Government will help promote this, not intervene to make it more difficult.

Sending the American Message

Proclaiming the American message is a vital step in the program for peace.

I will strengthen the United States International Communication Agency, including the Voice of America. We will also strengthen Radio Free Europe and Radio Liberty. Compared with other costs of our national security, the dollar amounts involved in this are small. What is needed most is a sense of conviction, the conviction that by carrying the American message abroad we strengthen the foundation of peace.

The current administration has permitted these vital efforts to decline.

For instance, the United States has been unable to broadcast to a majority of the Afghan people during these critical years, yet all the while Soviet-sponsored broadcasts were stirring up hatred toward America throughout the Islamic world.

For our long-term strategy, the communication of our ideals must become part of our strategy for peace.

We have a story to tell about the differences between the two systems now competing for the hearts and minds of mankind. There is the poverty and despair in the emerging nations who adopt Marxist totalitarianism and, by contrast, the freedom and prosperity of free market countries like Taiwan, South Korea, and Singapore.

A Realistic Strategic Arms Reduction Policy

As the next requirement for a program for peace, I would assign a high priority to strategic arms reduction. I have repeatedly said in this campaign that I will sit down with the Soviet Union for as long as it takes to negotiate a balanced and equitable arms limitation agreement, designed to improve the prospects for peace. To succeed at arms control, however, we must first be honest with ourselves so that we can be convincing with the Soviets.

We must honestly face the facts of the arms competition in which we are caught. And, we must have a view of the world that is consistent with these facts and that does not change to suit different audiences. The Carter administration told Congress that the Soviet Union has long been investing about three times as much as we have in strategic arms and is expected to continue doing so, with or without SALT II—the Strategic Arms Limitation Treaty.

The Senate Foreign Relations Committee, controlled by a Democratic majority, in a narrow vote came out for the Treaty, but only after more than 20 changes had been made.⁹ Then, on December 20, 1979, the Senate

⁹ On November 9, 1979, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee voted 9 to 6 to move the SALT II treaty to the full Senate. Church, Pell, McGovern, Biden, Sarbanes, Muskie, Javits, Percy, and Zorinsky voted in favor; Stone, Glenn, Howard Baker, Helms, Hayakawa, and Lugar voted against. (Charles Mohr, "Senate Committee Supports Arms Pact By a Vote of 9 to 6: Margin Disappoints Aide to Carter and Raises Fresh Doubts on Passage by Full Chamber," New York Times, November 10, 1979, pp. 1, 4) On January 3, 1980, Carter sent a letter to Byrd requesting that the Senate delay consideration of the treaty, following the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. For the text of the letter, see Public Papers: Carter, 1980–81, Book I, p. 12.

Armed Services Committee, also controlled by a Democratic majority, voted 10-0 with seven abstentions to adopt a report which concluded—and I urge you to listen closely to these words: “that the SALT II Treaty as it now stands, is not in the national security interests of the United States of America.”¹⁰ Finally, Mr. Carter could not even muster the necessary votes to pass his SALT Treaty in the United States Senate—yes, controlled by a Democratic majority—even before the Soviet Union invaded Afghanistan.

It would appear that members of his own party are trying to tell Mr. Carter something is flawed in his approach to arms limitation.

Please listen to the following statement:

“I must admit that I am not at all pleased that those of us expressing reservations and concern regarding the Treaty are characterized by some as warmongers.”¹¹

Ladies and gentlemen, that statement was made by a Democratic Senator, a Marine veteran, a former astronaut, and a man who, in 1976, Jimmy Carter considered for his vice-presidential running mate—John Glenn of Ohio.

I think it's time that you, the American people, heard some straight talk about Mr. Carter's SALT II Treaty. The real truth about that Treaty is that Mr. Carter himself doomed its fate from the moment it was negotiated. It has been effectively blocked, not by Ronald Reagan, but by the United States Senate—your elected representatives from all over the nation, fulfilling their constitutional obligation to advise and consent on treaties. It has been critically denounced by dozens of the most eminent scholars and knowledgeable analysts, Democrat as well as Republican.

¹⁰The ten senators who signed the report were Jackson, Tower, Cohen, Goldwater, Gordon Humphrey, Jepsen, Thurmond, Warner, Cannon, and Byrd. The seven senators who abstained were Stennis, Hart, Nunn, Culver, Morgan, Exon, and Levin. (Richard Burt, “Senate Panel Votes Antitreaty Report: Armed Services Committee Says Pact Limiting Strategic Arms Is Not in Interest of U.S.,” New York Times, December 21, 1979, p. A10) The text of the report is printed as Senate Report 96-1054, Military Implications of the Proposed SALT II Treaty Relating to the National Defense: Report of the Hearings on the Military Aspects and Implications of the Proposed SALT II Treaty (Executive Y, 96-1), Based Upon Hearings Held Before the Committee in Accordance With its Responsibilities Under Rule XXV (c) of the Standing Rules of the Senate together with Additional Views, 96th Cong., 2d sess., December 4, 1980 (Washington: Government Printing Office, 1980).

¹¹On October 20, Glenn expressed his displeasure that Reagan cited him as an opponent of SALT II. According to the Washington Post: “‘Gov. Reagan took my statement out of context,’ Glenn said. ‘I’m not opposed to the SALT treaty. There are just some details about verification I’m concerned about. I resent Gov. Reagan using my name in that regard.’” (“Glenn Objects to Reference That He Opposes SALT II,” Washington Post, October 21, 1980, p. A4)

As President, I will make immediate preparation for negotiations on a SALT III Treaty. My goal is to begin arms reductions. My energies will be directed at reducing destructive nuclear weaponry in the world—and doing it in such a way as to protect fully the critical security requirements of our nation.

The way to avoid an arms race is not simply to let the Soviets race ahead. We need to remove their incentive to race ahead by making it clear to them that we can and will compete if need be, at the same time we tell them that we prefer to halt this competition and reduce the nuclear arsenals by patient negotiation.

Restoring the Quality of our Armed Forces

Restoring a sense of pride in their careers for the men and women in our armed services is another important element of my program for peace. We must direct our attention to the urgent manpower needs of our services. In defense matters, we hear much about hardware, not enough about people. The most important part of our military strength is the people involved—their quality, their training, and their welfare. We must do all in our power to make sure they are well-trained and well-equipped, that they feel proud and secure in their jobs and that their economic sacrifice is not out of proportion to what we ask of them. The economic policies of the Carter administration have made life especially difficult for our men and women in uniform and for their families.

We can reverse this situation. We can implement a program of compensation and benefits for military personnel that is comparable to what is available in the private sector. I will ask Congress to reinstate the G.I. Bill,¹² a program which was directly responsible for the most rapid advance ever in the educational level of our population. Our country must provide our service personnel and their families with the security, the incentives, and the quality of life to compensate for the sacrifices they make on our behalf.

Combatting International Terrorism

Let us turn now to the need for the United States to assume a leadership role in curbing the spread of international terrorism. In sharing the outrage against terrorism, I will direct the resources of my administration against this scourge of civilization and toward expansion of our cooperation with other nations in combatting terrorism in its many forms.

Terrorists seek to undermine, paralyze and, finally, destroy democratic governments. Israel has long been the victim of the most wanton acts of terrorism. Our allies in Europe and elsewhere have experienced terrorism with increasing frequency.

Terrorist organizations have enjoyed the support—covert and open—of the Soviet Union. In Iran, terrorism has been elevated to the level of national policy in the assault on the U.S. Embassy and the year-long captivity of our fellow-citizens. The tactics and philosophy of the Palestine Liberation Organization are also based on terrorism.

We must restore the ability of the C.I.A. and other intelligence agencies to keep us informed and forewarned about terrorist activities and we must take the lead in forging an international consensus that firmness and refusal to concede or to pay ransom are ultimately the only effective deterrents to terrorism.

Restoring Our Margin of Safety for Peace

An important step—perhaps the most important of all—in a systematic program for peace is to restore the margin of safety for peace in our defense program by working closely with the Congress on a long-term program designed to meet our needs throughout this critical decade.

We must ask ourselves, is America more secure? Are we more confident of peace in the world than we were just four years ago? You know the answer to those questions: it is “no.”

President Ford left a long-range defense program designed to keep America strong throughout the 80s. He recognized that, after years of negotiation, the Soviet Union was still bent upon surpassing the United States in overall strategic strength.

Wisely, he did not give up on arms control negotiations, but sought to provide us with an “insurance policy” in the form of a balanced program to keep us from falling behind.

But, the Carter administration, in its haste to make good on a reckless campaign promise to cut defense spending by billions of dollars, insisted on a policy of systematic concessions in defense and in arms control negotiations.

Now I’ve criticized the President, I will admit, for not having kept his campaign promises. But in this case, I’m sorry to say, he did keep his promise. He has weakened our defense capability and wiped out our margin of safety.

My task as President will be to strengthen our defenses and to lead our allies in a sustained and prudent effort to keep us, and the entire world, secure from confrontation. The preservation of peace will require the best resources we can marshal in this precarious decade. We can marshal them by reaffirming our national purpose, by reasserting our will and determination, and by regaining our economic vitality.

But each of these approaches to establishing a real peace must rest on the firm underpinning of a strong American economy.

Tragically, the weakened state of America's economy has significantly affected our ability to have the strongest possible foreign and defense policies. Maintaining our strength requires having our people in productive jobs, not in unemployment lines. It requires having our citizens confident that their future will not continue to be eroded away by incredibly high inflation and interest rates. It demands a strong dollar that encourages other nations to trust us.

Our inflation has especially undermined the dollar and has upset world markets. Our trading partners now question our reliability. And when they question our economic reliability, they begin to question our reliability as a strong ally.

Our failed energy policies have caused many of our allies to blame the United States for the world's energy problem as much as OPEC. Neglect of energy realities diminishes our diplomatic strength. But worse, our dependence on imported oil also weakens our strategic position.

We can indeed make peace. We can have the peace we want for ourselves and for our children. We are going to have to work hard and think hard and act with competence and with confidence—but it can be done.

And, as we work, we will have to be inspired by the vision of what our country means to us and to the world.

In recent weeks, I have had that vision of our nation's meaning brought to my attention in a very personal way.

The home in which Nancy and I are temporarily living in the Virginia countryside during this campaign¹³ is only a relatively short distance away from the home of a great American President, Thomas Jefferson.

In his first Inaugural Address, Jefferson spoke of "the preservation of the general government in its whole constitutional vigor, as the sheet-anchor of our peace at home and our safety abroad." He knew that peace in the world depended on the strength of our nation in its "whole constitutional vigor."

¹³ Reference is to Wexford, the estate that John and Jacqueline Kennedy had built near Middleburg, Virginia. The Reagans rented the property so that the former Governor could prepare for his debate with Carter.

Jefferson loved America and the cause of peace too—too much ever to give in or appeal to fear and doubt.

I have known four wars in my lifetime—I don't want to see a fifth. I pray that never again will we bleed a generation of young Americans into the sands of island beachheads, the mud of European battlefields, or the rice paddies or jungles of Asia.

Whether we like it or not, it is our responsibility to preserve world peace because no one else can do it. We cannot continue letting events and crises get out of control, we must—through sound management and planning—be in control so as to prevent being confronted by a crisis. This requires a sound economy, a strong national defense, and the will and determination to preserve peace and freedom.

Recently, I was on the campaign trail in the state where I was born and raised, Illinois.¹⁴

Nancy and I travelled down through the central and southern part of the state by bus and car in a motorcade, stopping at lovely towns; we visited a coal mine typical of our industrial capacity; saw for the first time the tomb of Abraham Lincoln in Springfield. We toured a productive family farm and saw again the amazing gift for technology that the American farmer has and how much he contributes to eliminating hunger in the world. At the end of the day we stood on the banks of the Mississippi beneath that great silver arch there in St. Louis, Missouri.

It was a beautiful, crisp autumn day. Thousands of families had come out to see us at every stop. It was a moving experience, but I was most moved, as I always am, by the young people, the youngsters—from the little ones perched on their fathers shoulders to the teenagers. You get a rebirth of optimism about our nation's future when you see their young faces.

They are what this campaign is all about. Renewing our spirit, securing their future in a world at peace is the legacy I would like to leave for them.

You know, one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence said it isn't important that we leave wealth to our children, it is important that we leave them freedom. And we can only have that freedom if we continue to have peace throughout the world.

Thank you and good evening.

15. Editorial Note

In a November 3, 1980, televised address, Republican Presidential candidate Ronald Reagan reiterated his vision for the United States on the eve of the 1980 election. Reagan noted that the decisions voters made on November 4 would impact the United States “through what promises to be one of the most perilous decades in our history.” After outlining various domestic reform initiatives, Reagan asserted that he wanted to talk “not about campaign issues—but America, about us, you and me.” He continued: “Not so long ago, we emerged from a world war. Turning homeward at last, we built a grand prosperity and hoped—from our own success and plenty—to help others less fortunate.

“Our peace was a tense and bitter one, but in those days the center seemed to hold.

“Then came the hard years: riots and assassinations, domestic strife over the Vietnam War and in the last four years, drift and disaster in Washington.

“It all seems a long way from a time when politics was a national passion and sometimes even fun.

“A popular novel of the ‘60s ended prophetically with its description of a ‘kindly, pleasant, greening land about to learn whether history still has a place for a nation so strangely composed of great ideals and uneasy compromise as she.’

“That is really the question before us tonight: for the first time in our memory many Americans are asking: does history still have a place for America, for her people, for her great ideals? There are some who answer ‘no;’ that our energy is spent, our days of greatness at an end, that a great national malaise is upon us. They say we must cut our expectations, conserve and withdraw, that we must tell our children . . . not to dream as we once dreamed.”

Reagan then discussed heroism, using religious faith and patriotism, before returning to the issue of malaise. Noting that he had spent the year canvassing the United States and meeting a cross-section of citizens, Reagan asserted: “I find no national malaise, I find nothing wrong with the American people. Oh, they are frustrated, even angry at what has been done to this blessed land. But more than anything they are sturdy and robust as they have always been.”

Reagan cautioned any country that discerned “softness in our prosperity or disunity” to understand that Americans would “put aside in a moment” prosperity and disagreement “if the cause is a safe and peaceful future for our children.”

He continued: “Let it always be clear that we have no dreams of empire, that we seek no manifest destiny, that we understand the limitations of any one nation’s power.

“But let it also be clear that we do not shirk history’s call; that America is not turned inward but outward—toward others. Let it be clear that we have not lessened our commitment to peace or to the hope that someday all of the people of the world will enjoy lives of decency, lives with a degree of freedom, with a measure of dignity.

“Together, tonight, let us say what so many long to hear: that America is still united, still strong, still compassionate, still clinging fast to the dream of peace and freedom, still willing to stand by those who are persecuted or alone.

“For those who seek the right to self-determination without interference from foreign powers, tonight let us speak for them.

“For those who suffer for social or religious discrimination,

“For those who are victims of police states or government induced torture or terror,

“For those who are persecuted,

“For all the countries and people of the world who seek only to live in harmony with each other, tonight let us speak for them.

“And to our allies—who regard us with such constant puzzlement and profound affection—we must also speak tonight.

“To our Canadian neighbors who so recently rescued Americans in Teheran, to the people of Great Britain to whom ties of blood, language and culture bind so closely, to the people of France who midwived our birth as a nation, to the people of Germany and Japan with whom we bound up the wounds of war, to the people of Ireland and Italy and all the ethnic communities whose national heritages have enriched this nation and become our own, to the people of Israel with whom we enjoy the closest of friendships, to the people of Latin America, Australia, the Philippines, Taiwan, Korea—to all our allies great and small, we say tonight: at last the sleeping giant stirs and is filled with a resolve—a resolve that we will win together our struggle for world peace—our struggle for the human spirit.

“And to the people of Africa, we say that we seek a lasting, just and close relationship.

“To the people of China, with whom we have begun the first important steps to friendship—let it be known to them that we mean for that friendship to bring our peoples closer together.

“To the people of Russia—if only we could speak to them without their government intervening, they would know our willingness to build an enduring peace.” Reagan concluded his remarks with a series of questions that he suggested voters might ask themselves the next day at the polls and an exhortation that Americans “resolve tonight that young Americans will always see those Potomac lights; that they will always find there a city of hope in a country that is free. And let us resolve they will say of our day and of our generation that we did keep faith with our God, that we did act ‘worthy of ourselves;’ that we did protect and pass on lovingly that shining city on a hill.” (Undated Reagan-Bush Committee News Release; Reagan Library, White House Office of Speechwriting, Research Office, 1980 Campaign File, Campaign and Pre-Presidential Speeches, 1979–1981, 11/03/1980 Reagan TV Address—A Vision for America)

THE PHILOSOPHY AND BASIC PRINCIPLES OF PRESIDENT REAGAN’S FOREIGN POLICY

Ronald Reagan conveyed his views on foreign and defense policy during the election campaign through many speeches and statements. The voters who elected him to be President were aware, in general terms, of what he stands for on national security and foreign policy.²

The paper printed here is Tab I of Allen’s binder, prepared in advance of the Board’s first meeting on November 21. An agenda, a press release, and Tabs II and III, consisting of undated papers outlining issues requiring a position prior to the inauguration and policy initiatives requiring reorganization, are attached but not printed. Tab IV, a report for President-elect Reagan, is not attached. No minutes of the meeting have been found. An October 25 news release issued by the Reagan-Bush Committee announced that Reagan had appointed an interim foreign policy advisory committee designed to “monitor and assess international developments through the inauguration on January 20.” The board members were: Allen, Howard Baker, Casey, Clements, Ford, Haig, Kirkpatrick, Kissinger, McCloy, Eugene Rostow, Rumsfeld, Shultz, Tower, and Weinberger. President-elect Reagan, in his press conference on November 6,³ reiterated that he stood by the policies for which he campaigned—including the Republican Platform.

Hence, the overall philosophy and basic principles of President Reagan's foreign policy have already been articulated. The main task before us now is to apply these principles to specific issues that must be decided, particularly those that are time urgent.

In addition, we should consider whether a reaffirmation of President Reagan's foreign policy will be needed early on, and if so, how the principles of his policy should be elaborated. Several options are available for such a reaffirmation or elaboration:

- a foreign policy section in the Inaugural Address
- a State of the World Message to Congress to be delivered a few weeks after Inauguration
- Shorter Presidential messages combined with statements by the Secretary of State
- Messages to Soviets, PRC, key allies, etc.

[The second page of the paper is missing in the original.] tolerable basis, this is only possible if we first restore deterrence and containment. Then and only then, can some genuine cooperation be achieved in U.S.-Soviet relations.

"America is still number one"

The President-elect has felt it his duty to explain to the American people the facts of the present military weakness of the United States. His Administration will pay close attention to the realities of the balance of power and will keep the American public fully informed of these realities, in order to sustain its expressed determination to remedy the severe shortcomings of our military posture.

"North-South" relations and the "New International Economic Order"

The President-elect refuses to see the world through false symmetries. There is no uniform "south", or "third world" but rather a whole variety of countries, some very rich and others very poor; their individuality cannot be submerged under misleading slogans.

A Reagan Administration will do nothing to give further currency to the myth of a North-South division, and will see no need to formulate a broad policy towards the mythical entity called the “south” or the “third world”.

Instead there will be bilateral policies, country by country, conducted in full recognition of their individuality and our own interests, moral as well as material. The key to good relations with the countries now lumped together [as] the third world is to have good relations which [with] each, on the basis of mutual respect and reciprocal good will.

As for the “New International Economic Order” and the claims made upon us on the basis of that slogan, again the Reagan Administration will repudiate the false concept while striving to achieve substantive results on a bilateral basis.⁴ The United States has done much to help the poor countries and we will do more. But we should flatly reject the notion that the less productive have some sort of claim on those more productive, based on the myth of past exploitation. The Reagan Administration will not hesitate to note that the countries which made the best economic progress are those that encouraged free market economies and capitalist principles.

17. Report Prepared by the Department of State Transition Team¹

Washington, December 22, 1980

TEAM DIRECTOR'S OVERVIEW AND SUMMARY

Introduction:

Like all bureaucracies the Department of State can be elusive. This is not necessarily intentional on the part of the permanent officialdom but lies in a certain mind-set of the Foreign Service, to wit, that (1) foreign policy is a secret art understandable only to the anointed and (2) that the art of diplomacy requires a constant search after areas of agreement, i.e., consensus and compromise.

Yet, it is an indubitable fact that foreign policy is made by the President, by the Secretary of State, and also at other levels of the U.S. Government structure, including the Congress, and that the President and the Secretary of State have to be in a position to resist the professional tendency toward compromise when, in their opinion, overriding policy and strategic concerns warrant it. At the same time the Executive has to be apprised by the foreign affairs machinery of the probable cost of various courses of action and inaction.

There is no question that a highly skilled, professional Foreign Service is the principal instrument for the execution of foreign policy. The loyalty of the Foreign Service will not be a problem. On the contrary, a very large number of Foreign Service officers has long been discouraged, even disgusted by the incompetence of the Carter administration, and there is reason to believe that a larger number of Foreign Service officers supported the present change in administration than at any time in the Department's history.

Abshire), National Security Group (Abshire)—Department of State—Final Report 12/22/80 Vol. I (1/6). No classification marking. Volume I of the report includes the Team Director's Overview and Summary and Tabs A–G. Volume II includes Tabs M–S and is in the Reagan Library, 1980 Transition Papers, Deputy Director for Executive Branch Management (William Timmons), Issues Clusters, National Security (D. Abshire), National Security Group (Abshire)—Department of State—Final Report 12/22/80 Vol. II. All tabs are attached but not printed. Before the inauguration, the Reagan transition team established an Office of Executive Branch Management headed by Timmons. Robert Neumann served as the team leader for the Department of State Transition Team and reported to Abshire, the team leader for national security affairs. In addition to Neumann, the members of the State Transition Team were Adelman, Brower, Codevilla, Crocker, Drischler, Hackett, McFarlane, Pipes, Rashish, Sanjuan, Stern, Tiller, Weiss, Winsor, and Zapanta.

But if loyalty is not likely to be a problem, control is, because of the ability of all bureaucracies to delay, obfuscate or iron out internal differences by producing mush (thus depriving the Secretary of an opportunity to receive hard-hitting recommendations).

Gaining Control of the Department: First Steps

How then, can the Secretary of State get hold of the Department quickly, be assured that he receives the best recommendations and analyses, and see to it that the Department is managed in such a way as to inspire and motivate its staff?

The key office assisting the Secretary in his daily work is the Executive Secretariat (S/S), whose functions are: (a) information management, (b) coordination of action documents, and (c) formal liaison with the NSC.

The key staff officer for this purpose is the Executive Secretary, and the Secretary should choose his own man for this job as soon as possible. He should have the following characteristics: (1) a personality which fits well with that of the Secretary, (2) good judgment as to priorities, (3) management ability, (4) a thorough knowledge of the Department, and (5) incredible stamina. He is the Secretary's eyes and ears, buffer, coordinator, briefer, expeditor. He must have an issues background but should not be an issues man. If he becomes fascinated with policy and involves himself in it, he adds a layer and becomes a bottleneck. Several Executive Secretaries of the past committed this error and had to be removed.

Also central to the Secretary's exercise of control are the offices of the Deputy Secretary, the Under Secretary of Political Affairs, the other Under Secretaries (especially for Management), the Director General, the Inspector General, the Policy Planning Staff, etc. These functions are treated under Tab A. However, the post of the Executive Secretary is so important, that it has been highlighted in this Overview and Summary.

Principal Foreign Policy Issues:

To put our policy and diplomacy in nautical terms, we must have a compass to chart our course, but we must also watch the rocks along the shore, lest the ship founder.

The compass represents the overall conception of our foreign policy, particularly the attention which has to be accorded East-West relations, as the Soviet Union represents our largest and most dangerous adversary worldwide.

But we cannot overlook the rocks, i.e., regional conflicts and priorities. Thus it is a fact that while much of the world shares some of our preoccupation with the USSR and East-West relations, most of those regions give regional issues a place of priority. Since we cannot easily force our priorities on other people, our diplomacy faces the difficult task of blending our and their priorities into a reasonable whole, enabling our diplomacy to proceed with maximum support from other countries.

Europe:

The members of the Working Party underscore Europe's need for a firm and confident American leadership, as well as evidence that we are making serious efforts to bring our defense and economic house in order. Aside from certain vocal but limited political groups, most Europeans—and not only in the West—would welcome a strong, consistent, and predictable America.

In its approach to U.S.-Europe relations, the Working Group has focussed largely on the East-West optic. This, to be sure, is a very important aspect though not the only one through which to view U.S.-European relations. There is also the tactical question whether this emphasis is best designed to gain for us maximum European cooperation.

In view of the vital as well as difficult nature of European-American economic relations, one needs to examine the question whether the subordination of those relations to strategic and ideological considerations will be best suited to obtain vital Western cooperation on economic, financial and energy matters which are of top priority to European leaders. We need to counter European economic dependence on the USSR, but we will not be effective if we hector them as Carter and Mondale did at the beginning of their terms.

The Working Group rightly diagnoses weaknesses or "soft spots" in European policy and attitudes toward the Soviet Union, but assumes that Western Europe will be ready to follow our leadership if we are firm with them. However, our European allies perceive many divergent interests which can be solved only through a pattern of very close consultations. We will be aided in this by the strong confidence of European leaders in Secretary-designate Haig. This would be endangered if the Europeans felt that they saw a pattern of American unilateralism.

Because of the Working Group's focus on East-West relations, it makes a strong pitch to split the Bureau of European Affairs into one for Western and one for Eastern Europe. It also makes a recommendation for the appointment of a high official in the Department charged with the supervision of East-West relations. The argument has some weight because the Bureau's present focus on the multiplicity of U.S.-West European relations sometimes results in some neglect of the East European agenda. This is not a new proposal and has been debated in the past. It was rejected then and is rejected by some other members of the Transition Team, including the Team Leader, on the ground that East-West relations are not specifically European but worldwide and should be supervised by the officer with worldwide responsibility, normally, the Secretary of State. Also, the creation of a separate bureaucracy would tend to create an adversary relationship between that new bureaucracy and existing bureaus, especially that for Western Europe. Many issues that are now handled within the Bureau of European Affairs would have to be arbitrated on the Seventh Floor, if at all, and would either add to the already awesome burden of decision-making at that level, or fall between the cracks.

Middle East: The Middle East is a pressure area for the most delicate and difficult balancing of worldwide (East-West) and regional interests and priorities. Our diplomacy cannot be effective unless we recognize the existence of different priorities and succeed in creating a balance between the two.

As far as the long-standing Arab-Israeli conflict is concerned, we must recognize one central point: it is only one of several conflicts, but it overshadows all others insofar as it places limits on the degree to which we can get closer to the moderate and economically essential Arab states.

Furthermore, this conflict is now passing through a transitional period of great delicacy. The Working Group points out correctly that the (Camp David) peace process² is going nowhere despite the terminal optimism of Ambassador Sol Linowitz. The report also highlights the extreme unlikelihood of any positive results occurring during the remaining life of the Begin Government. And when Begin goes, the Labor government, which by all indications will succeed Begin, has already focussed on a different and diplomatically more hopeful approach.

Yet both the Israelis and Egyptians are committed to the Camp David process and Sadat, in particular, is anxious lest he be blindsided by a different initiative (European plan, Jordanian option, etc.) which would bypass and dangerously isolate him.

² Carter, Begin, and Sadat met at Camp David in September 1978, where Begin and Sadat agreed to documents that would provide a framework for peace in the Middle East. For the texts of the Framework for Peace in the Middle East and the Framework for the Conclusion of a Peace Treaty Between Egypt and Israel, see Public Papers: Carter, 1978, Book II, pp. 1523–1528. On March 26, 1979, Sadat and Begin signed the Egyptian-Israeli Peace Treaty. For the text of the treaty, see Department of State Bulletin, May 1979, pp. 3–15. The complete English language version, including annexes, minutes, and letters, is printed in Public Papers: Carter, 1979, Book I, pp. 495–517. See also Foreign Relations, 1977–1980, vol. IX, Arab-Israeli Dispute, August 1978–December 1980, Second, Revised Edition, Document 239.

The immediate diplomatic task for the United States is therefore to keep all options open and, frankly, tread water, until Begin has left office. But we must not be too obvious about this lest we arouse strong reactions from Begin, or create the illusion among the Arabs that if they were to do nothing we would get their chestnuts out of the fire.

For the near term, we should therefore keep the Peace Process going, but in a less dramatic fashion than in the past. Therefore, the position of the Peace Negotiator (now encumbered by Linowitz) should not be officially abolished but be temporarily kept vacant. While opposing Linowitz's agitation for the immediate appointment of a highly visible successor, we see merit in keeping his regional office in the Middle East (now under Ambassador Leonard) intact.³ Eventually, a successor might be appointed if the new diplomatic circumstances make it desirable. It is interesting that this is also the opinion of former Under Secretary Joseph Sisco.⁴

Once the Peace Process can be resumed, it will require the blending of several formulas (including possibly a "Jordanian option"). Here again, we regard as unhelpful, Linowitz's current public statements that the Camp David process, as it is presently undertaken, constitutes the only path to peace.⁵

Attention also needs to be focussed on several other areas which are more extensively treated in the paper of the Working Group. While there are many issues of importance, the following will need priority attention soon after January 20:

1. Should we give some additional, limited (clandestine) support to the Afghan freedom fighters opposing the Soviet invasion? If so, our relationship to Pakistan has to be considerably reevaluated, as indicated in the report of the Working Group.

2. Saudi Arabia has made its request for additional military equipment the litmus test of its relations with the U.S. If we do not negotiate this one most carefully and, in particular, if we were to take unilateral action without adequate, in-depth consultation with the Saudis, we would, in terms of the Middle Eastern mentality, make Saudi retaliation virtually inevitable. This would be most likely to take the form of a reduction of Saudi oil production, which would hurt us and the West just when the shortfall created by the Iran-Iraq war would hurt the market. The consequences could be explosive.

³James Leonard served as Linowitz's deputy, beginning in May 1979.

⁴Sisco served as Under Secretary of State for Political Affairs from February 19, 1974, until June 30, 1976.

⁵Presumable reference to Linowitz's December 19 news conference in London, following his meeting with Lord Carrington. At the news conference, Linowitz outlined five areas of Egyptian-Israeli disagreement. He also "described the Camp David formula for the autonomy talks, in which the United States is playing the role of mediator, as the only way of bringing a peaceful settlement acceptable to Israel and satisfactory to the Palestinians." (Youssef Ibrahim, "Linowitz, Summing Up Mission, Sees 5 'Crucial' Palestinian Issues," New York Times, December 20, 1980, p. 2)

3. The Jordanian arms request, while less extensive than the Saudi one, is also delicate if we want to retain the possibility of a “Jordanian option.” The need for a decision will come very early in the Reagan Administration.

4. In the strategic North African region, Morocco and Tunisia are loyal friends but the Carter administration has consistently short-changed both relationships. We need to evolve a comprehensive concept of our relationships with Morocco and Algeria which supports our friends while also acknowledging significant American interests in Algeria. We also need to make some hard choices about Libya, and support Tunisia (while Bourguiba still lives) in a manner and on a scale which that country’s consistent pro-Western stance has earned.

East Asia: Many significant issues will confront the new Administration in this area, but most of them are somewhat more manageable, or at least less urgent, than the blistering array of interlocking policy conundrums we face in the Middle East. The most urgent problem is the Kim Dae Jung affair in Korea;⁶ the most important issues are the balancing of our PRC interests with our Taiwan connection and the overriding need to give more priority to our relations with Japan (and be seen by the Japanese to be so doing). On all of these issues, there is no significant dissent within our Transition Team to either the analysis or the recommendations set forth by the Working Group in Tab D.

On the Kim Dae Jung affair, the recent signal from the President-elect probably constitutes all that can productively be done on our own side, until January 20 at least—and hopefully if he survives until then, the worst of the crisis will be over.

As to the PRC and Taiwan, we should move with caution and deliberation, resisting pressures from either side to provide those elements of either symbolic or substantive support that will needlessly interfere with our interests vis-a-vis the other party. This is probably one of those issues that we can afford to put on the back burner for a while, despite its importance, because it suits our interests to do so.

⁶ In September, opposition leader Kim was sentenced to death following a military tribunal. Documentation is scheduled for publication in Foreign Relations, 1977–1980, vol. XIV, Japan; Korea.

The Working Group's recommendations on Japan make up an interesting and persuasive package. We want to flag here the notion that the successor to Mike Mansfield be selected with great care and that Mansfield be left in place for some time to come to provide time for the best possible choice.

Finally, attention is invited to the fact that this Working Group, along with several others on our team, has noted with concern the absence of any visible relationship between decisions on allocations of foreign aid and our national foreign policy concerns. We shall comment in more detail on this phenomenon later in this report.

Africa: The Working Group on Africa's submission for this final report built on rather than replicating the material in its excellent submission for our interim report and we are therefore including both submissions under Tab E.

The most urgent country and regional issues in Africa south of the Sahara relate to the Southern African region and to the Horn of Africa. The talks on Namibia are at a sensitive stage right now. We will need to have a position on aid to Zimbabwe by March. These and related issues need to be weighed in the context of decisions on our stance and objectives toward South Africa. In the Horn, the need is for a coherent approach reconciling our conflicting objectives of reducing Soviet presence and access in the area, especially in Ethiopia, while consolidating our own access to a badly needed military facility in Somalia.

The most, important (as opposed to urgent) relationship we have in Black Africa is with Nigeria. The Working Group suggests that the new Administration can find ways to keep Nigeria on board, without ". . . apologizing (Carter-fashion) for having national interests and Western leadership responsibilities."

Both the interim and final reports make a strong case for moving energetically to make U.S. aid instruments responsive to national policy, and provide a number of specific proposals for doing this.

Latin America: The Working Group that has covered ARA in the Department submitted what was essentially its final report two weeks ago, for inclusion in the Team's interim report. That text is included at Tab F, together with the following additional material which has been submitted within the last several days:

- (a) A report on U.S.-Mexican relations.
- (b) A report on Central America.
- (c) A report on potential use of the U.S. Coast Guard to enhance U.S. security and the stability of the Caribbean.

(d) Three short studies prepared by the Caribbean Council for the Working Group at the latter's request:

- (i) "The U.S. and the Caribbean."
- (ii) "U.S. Development Assistance Policy in the Caribbean Island Nations and Dependencies."
- (iii) "The U.S. and Latin America."

(e) A report on "Immigration and National Security" prepared by the Heritage Foundation at the Working Group's request.

There is general agreement within the team that the Carter Administration's policies toward Latin America were overly influenced by professional notions of social change, to the extent that they became somewhat estranged from the service of direct and important U.S. national interests. The Working Group has analyzed at some length, for example the tendency of some U.S. Ambassadors ". . . to function in the capacity of surrogate political activists and advocates of new theories of social change with latitude to experiment within the countries to which they are accredited . . ." Extensive recommendations to correct this situation are made, in terms of policies and, particularly, bureaucratic structures.

The separate paper on Mexico recommends the creation of a new regional bureau within the Department for Canada and Mexico. While it is undoubtedly true that there has been a tendency in recent years to downplay our relations with each of these important neighbors, the Team Leader and some other members regard the proposal to create a new bureau as draconian and cannot support it, for much the same reasons as those that temper our enthusiasm for a new bureau for communist affairs, or Soviet/East European affairs. Basically, good management principles require that the level at which most decisions are taken be pushed down in the hierarchy, not up. Much of the Carter administration's inability to persuade the electorate that it knew what it was doing was caused by its predilection at the very top to agonize over essentially secondary issues, with the result that it was unable to see the forest for the trees. This tendency was also visible on the Department's Seventh Floor. We must not allow ourselves to fall into the same trap.

To end on a more positive note, attention is drawn to the short piece buried in the middle of Tab F on the potential use of the U.S. Coast Guard to advance U.S. interests in the Caribbean. This is an excellent example of the kind of sensible, practical and do-able initiative that the working levels of the State Department can be expected to conceive and implement if the new Administration (a) gives them broad, coherent, and consistent policy guidelines, (b) gets off their backs as far as day-to-day operations are concerned, and (c) gives them some reasonable voice in decisions on the allocation of required resources.

Department of State Leadership in Foreign Affairs:

The Department of State must gain and maintain management control over U.S. foreign policy. This is a common, consistent theme which has run through all the Team's studies. From regional policy issues—where under the Carter administration the NSC has frequently circumvented the Department, e.g., in Latin American Affairs (see Mr. Sanjuan's ARA paper at Tab F)—to the use of specific policy instruments (FMS, AID, IDCA resources), the Department has not been in a position either to coordinate or to control U.S. foreign policy. This will have to change.

According to a very broad consensus within our Team, the Secretary of State must from the outset of the new Administration be seen by all—the President, the Cabinet, other Government entities, the Congress and the public—to be the President's spokesman on foreign affairs. The role of the coordinator can follow from that of spokesman. But to gain effective management control of foreign policy implementation, the Secretary must manage the resources used in its implementation. Therefore, the Secretary must, as quickly as possible, be given authority to direct the allocation and use of all resources, including those of AID, IDCA, Peace Corps, FMS, and PL-480 programming,⁷ to ensure they are meeting the foreign policy needs of U.S. national interests. This will require early development of a foreign affairs budget from which effective resource allocation decisions can be made, as touched on in Tab G (p. 2) and Tab H (p. 12). Section III.A. of the African paper (Tab E) describes one specific approach toward meeting this need: establishment of a new unit, directly responsible to the Secretary, for foreign assistance management, analysis, and priority setting.

Only the Department of State is in a position to provide continuity and leadership across the increasingly complex range of international issues and problems with their built-in constituencies and domestic links. The Department's role, in this respect, is the weakest in the crucial international economics area, a fact which must be changed if coherent international economic policies are to be achieved and maintained over time and made consistent with domestic economic policy requirements. Tab G on "The Economic Functions of the Department of State" treats this area in depth, and the author's recommendations and conclusions deserve full support. In sum, institutional or structural changes in the bureaucracy are not going to be nearly as relevant to solving this problem as the personal element: The new Under Secretary for Economic Affairs must be an individual of recognized stature with a strong sense of mission who fully enjoys the strong and continuing support of the Secretary of State.

[Omitted here are the sections “Personnel and Budget: Getting the Tools to Do the Job,” “Proposed Structural Changes in the Department,” and “Refugee Affairs.”]

The items listed above represent policy issues and management problems on which, in the opinion of the Transition Team, the Secretary of State-designate should focus priority attention. Obviously he will make his own decisions regarding both priority order and the manner in which he will vest responsibility in other officers. Not mentioned in this Executive Summary is the regrettable possibility that the Reagan Administration may inherit the hostage problem in Iran. Separate papers and ideas have been gathered by the Team Leader and other members but have not been included in this Final Report because conditions between now and January 20 may change sufficiently to affect the nature of the problem and the available options.

It should be stated, however, that those members of the Transition Team who are familiar with the Middle East in general and Iran in particular, are extremely critical of the manner in which the Carter administration has handled the problem. Should the Reagan Administration have to shoulder this burden, just doing more of the same (which has failed) will not be sufficient. The Transition Team, in cooperation with other experts, stands ready to submit suggestions and scenarios if so tasked.

Finally, many other foreign policy issues and organizational matters that were not mentioned in this Executive Summary, have been treated as mentioned in the several reports attached hereto—and there are surely some which could not be treated by a relatively small team working for only five weeks.

We hope and believe, however, that the above list will give the Secretary of State-designate an opportunity to grasp quickly the slippery reins of the Department of State and to assist the incoming Administration in creating a foreign policy style and determination which is strong, consistent and predictable—something which has long been lacking. The new Secretary of State surely has the Transition Team’s best wishes and sincere hopes for good luck. He will need it!

18. Editorial Note

Following his electoral victory on November 4, 1980, President-elect Ronald Reagan asked Alexander M. Haig, Jr., to serve as his Secretary of State. Haig had served in various capacities during the Richard Nixon, Gerald Ford, and Jimmy Carter administrations, including as Military Assistant to the President's Assistant for National Security Affairs and President's Deputy Assistant for National Security Affairs, Army Vice Chief of Staff, Assistant to the President and White House Chief of Staff, and Commander-in-Chief, European Command and Supreme Allied Commander, Europe. Following his retirement from the U.S. Army in June 1979, Haig moved to Philadelphia to become director of the Foreign Policy Research Institute. In late 1979, he became President and Chief Operating Officer of United Technologies Corporation (UTC).

In his memoir of his tenure as Secretary of State, Haig noted that Reagan's primary foreign policy advisor Richard Allen had telephoned him after the November 1980 election to indicate that Haig was a candidate for a cabinet post. Reagan subsequently telephoned Haig on December 11, 1980, to ask him "to join my team." Haig wrote, "I accepted. I accepted with a certain sense of loss, to go back to an old life that I knew was filled with difficulty and misunderstanding and implacable (and often unjust) judgment of character and performance. I had served near to six Presidents. I had seen one of them fall in dreadful disgrace, but I had seen Presidents, including Richard Nixon, rise in triumph also. I had seen war as it was made in high places and as it was fought on the battlefield. I did not want to see any more of it. It seemed a good thing to do what one could to prevent more wars from being made. Therefore, I accepted the post Reagan had offered me with a glad and hopeful spirit." (Haig, Caveat, pages 12, 13–14)

On January 9, 1981, Haig testified before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, which was holding a hearing in order to consider Haig's nomination. Senator Charles Percy (R-Illinois) chaired the hearing and began by welcoming Haig and summarizing his professional career. Following discussion regarding the participation of Senators who were not members of the committee and a request that the committee subpoena additional documentation, Percy directed Haig to offer his opening statement. After asserting that "there could be no more critical time at which to assume the post of Secretary of State," Haig acknowledged that the American "record in this century is not perfect" but "should be a source of great pride." He continued: "Our ideals must be reconciled with the reality we face. The United States must pursue its vision of justice in an imperfect and constantly changing world—full of peril, but also full of opportunity. The world does not stand still for our elections, important as they are. Complex issues already crowd our foreign policy agenda. The earlier the Reagan administration articulates its approach to these issues, the better served the nations of the world and the people of our own Nation will be.

"It would be premature here to set forth definitive policies or offer detailed programs. Both tasks require analysis and thoughtful consideration by the President-elect and his advisors. But President-elect Reagan and I firmly believe that American foreign policy should have some permanent bedrock. The United States has been most effective in the world arena when the solid foundations of its foreign policy have been recognized and understood—by our own people and by the nations with which we must deal."

After summarizing his prior government service and explaining how he viewed the Watergate scandal during the time he served as Nixon's Chief of Staff, Haig described the international environment in which the incoming Reagan administration would pursue its policies. He suggested that the coming years would prove "unusually dangerous," adding that the evidence "is everywhere." Yet these dangers were only symptomatic "of a more fundamental world problem." Haig explained: "These fundamental problems—the diffusion of power, the interdependence of the allied community, and the failure to recognize the variety among the so-called Third World nations—are made the more intractable by what is perhaps the central strategic phenomenon of the post-World War II era: The transformation of Soviet military power from a continental and largely defensive land army to a global offensive army, navy, and air force, fully capable of supporting an imperial foreign policy.

"Considered in conjunction with the episodic nature of the West's military response, this tremendous accumulation of armed might has produced perhaps the most complete reversal of global power relationships ever seen in a period of relative peace. Today, the threat of Soviet military intervention colors attempts to achieve international civility. Unchecked, the growth of Soviet military power must eventually paralyze Western policy altogether.

"These, then, are the fundamental problems which challenge American foreign policy and the future of democracies generally.

"To say that is not to diminish the importance of other Western goals: The eradication of hunger, poverty, and disease; the expansion of the free flow of people, goods, and ideas; the spread of social justice; and through these and similar efforts, the improvement of the human condition. It is simply to recognize that these desirable and critical objectives are impossible to achieve in an international environment dominated by violence, terrorism, and threat.

"The United States has a very clear choice. We can continue, if we wish, to react to events as they occur—serially, unselectively, and increasingly in the final analysis, unilaterally. One lesson of Afghanistan is certainly that few symptomatic crises are capable of effectively rallying the collective energies of the free world. We may wish it were otherwise, but wishing will not make it so.

"Alternately, we can confront the fundamental issues I have discussed. We can seek actively to shape events and, in the process, attempt to forge a consensus among like-minded peoples.

"Such a consensus will enable us to deal with the more fundamental tasks I have outlined: The management of Soviet power; the reestablishment of an orderly international economic climate; the economic and political maturation of developing nations to the benefit of their peoples; and the achievement of a reasonable standard of international civility. Acting alone, each of these tasks is beyond even our power; acting together, all are within the capacity of free nations.

"I do not mean to belittle the difficulties. They are formidable. But our collective capacity to meet them is also formidable. The challenge of American foreign policy in the eighties is to marshal that capacity."

Continuing, Haig stated that success required consistent actions, reliable behavior, and a demonstrated balance in foreign policy approaches and orchestration. The task before the United States, he stated, was the reestablishment of "an effective foreign policy consensus." After describing the contours of this policy, Haig concluded his remarks by enumerating the resources that the United States continued to enjoy: "Although we have economic problems, we still possess the largest and strongest economy on Earth. It is within our power to revitalize our productive base; maintain and expand our agricultural strength; regain commercial competitiveness; and reduce our dependency on foreign sources of energy and other raw materials. No American foreign policy can succeed from a base of economic weakness.

"Our alliances enable us to draw on the strengths and the wisdom of some of the world's greatest nations. Yet, our alliances must be tended, and adapted to new problems not visualized by their creators. In the process, we must bear in mind that the essence of any alliance is the core of shared commitment and shared endeavor. In the 1980's we should not let ourselves become preoccupied with debates over who is doing more; the challenges we face will require more from all of us.

"We possess a full range of the instruments of effective statecraft: a diplomatic corps second to none; economic and military assistance programs; a variety of sophisticated cultural and informational resources; and, of course, a military power which no potential adversary can afford to ignore.

“These instruments provide the United States with the unrivaled capacity to influence the course of international events. Their maintenance or neglect will declare American intentions far more clearly than any rhetoric you or I dispense today.” (*Nomination of Alexander M. Haig, Jr., Hearings Before the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, Ninety-Seventh Congress, First Session, on the Nomination of Alexander M. Excerpts of Haig’s statement are also printed in Department of State Bulletin, February 1981, pages C–F. For Haig’s recollection of the hearings, see Caveat, pages 37–52. On January 15, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee voted 15–2 to approve Haig as Secretary of State. The full Senate voted 93–6 to approve the nomination on January 21. Haig was sworn in as Secretary on January 22.

13038. For the Ambassador from Bridges. Subject: Official-Informal.

1. Open Forum: “Reflections on the Transition.” Following strictly FYI is a report from EE’s Tom Longo of strictly off-the-record Open Forum comments January 16 by State Department Transition Team head, Amb. Robert Neumann.² The theme was a personal retrospective by Neumann on the transition.

2. Neumann outlined conceptually three aspects to transition: physical replacement of outs with ins; evolution from vague and blunt campaign statements geared to play well in Peoria to accommodation with hard reality; and “transition from the transition,” i.e.,

² Rusk established the Open Forum in 1967 in order to facilitate the free exchange of ideas within the Department of State.

from interregnum recommendations to early policy decisions of the new team.

He explained that the 100-plus Reagan Transition Teams throughout the government had operated under the same mandate from Reagan central: (A) to review personnel and identify who could, might, or should be replaced; (B) to review operating structures and make recommendations on structural changes, and (C) to make policy recommendations for questions which the new team would face in the near term.

3. Neumann emphasized that he had not selected the State Transition Team.³ The Reagan people had, and the selection had been avowedly "political" in that it had aimed to get representatives from the Hill, from the campaign, and from the interested private sector together to interact with each other and get a sense of governance and reality. The idea was to merge a large number of persons, including younger ones, coming from the exuberance and hype of the political campaign, with the career services and with real-world problems. Representatives from the Hill were explicitly included in order to make Congress a full partner in the transition. This input, said Neumann, was "absolutely vital," given the need for any President in the present day to "negotiate" with Congress. Neumann acknowledged that transition interactions of persons with different bents had been "corrosive, abrasive, and brutal" at times, but the real political world lacked diplomatic niceties. Neumann said that even the more strident individuals from outside State had come away with a high regard for the career people.

4. In a lengthy, strictly personal aside, Neumann said he believes strongly that the American people opted strongly on November 4 for more than just the ouster of the Carter administration. Venting themselves against "the flag burners and the Jane Fondas" of the Vietnam days, the voters were reacting to what had been a type of assault on basic patriotic values. Some of this feeling, said Neumann, had come out during the Panama Canal Treaty debate, and was not really directed against the Panama Canal Treaty itself.⁴ This resentment or "rage" fed into other things, but essentially antedated the Carter administration and the Carter “non-government.” In the sense of a mandate, the people voted for more than a “mild course correction.”

5. If this is true, continued Neumann, then there must be major change, and persons identified with the old order of things must be removed, lest the electorate get a sense of betrayed promises. (Neumann emphasized that this did not presage a return to McCarthy like persecution of the career service.) Professional diplomats execute the policies of the political leadership, but in human terms the enthusiasm with which they do so varies.

6. In this regard, Neumann emphasized that the wide publicity given early in the transition to a Reagan hit list of diplomats was in fact a highly selective leak of only a part of the first and most tentative of three transition documents mandated by Reagan central.⁵ Motivation for the leak was “not necessarily advocacy of the public interest.”

7. Concluding his prepared remarks, Neumann reminded listeners that the end product of the Transition Team was only recommendations and not policy, and conceded that some of the recommendations might reflect the excited views of some persons still flushed from the campaign. Drawing on a German saying, he quipped that “You don’t eat it as hot as you cook it.” He invited listeners to adopt a wait-and-see attitude rather than “indulge in the depth of paranoia.”

8. Selected excerpts from the ensuing question-and-answer session follow:

Q. May one infer that in view of the utility Neumann cited of moving gradually from campaign hyperbole to objective reality, he would not wish to see the constitutional transition period shortened?

A. Ideally, perhaps a month would be appropriate. Anything less would “compress the errors.” But in view of the difficulty in amending the Constitution, it would not be worth trying to change the present schedule.

⁵ References are to the two interim reports and the final report (see Document 17) prepared by the Department of State Transition Team. In a December 3, 1980, article, Richard Burt indicated that both the ACDA and Department of State transition teams had sent reports to Reagan transition headquarters on December 2, noting that the Department team’s report “says that the department is a ‘bureaucratic jumble’ and that it is proposing a plan to give the White House greater control over the selection of career Foreign Service officers for top jobs.” (“Reagan Team Says Arms Agency Neglects Its Surveillance Function,” New York Times, p. A10) On December 10, the New York Times reported on Ambassador to El Salvador Robert White’s criticism of one of the interim reports and its impact on the conduct of foreign policy. The article stated, “In another report prepared by the transition team, Mr. White was on a list of ambassadors to be replaced because of their outspoken positions on human rights and social change.” (“U.S. Envoy in Salvador Charges Reagan Team Is Undercutting Him,” pp. A1, A6)

Q. What is the truth behind the press reports that General Haig dismissed the Transition Team abruptly?⁶

A. The Transition Team submitted three reports, one on November 24, the second on December 8, the last on December 22. The “hit list” leak was from the first report; there have not been leaks from the others. It was envisioned that after submission of the third report the Transition Team would disband except perhaps for a few individuals. Hence, there was no abrupt “dismissal” by Haig, although some people did misunderstand or take offense and resorted to their “Dissent Channel” leaks. Something abrupt did take place in regard to the Defense Department Transition Team, but not at State.

Q. Could Neumann give an idea of the Transition Team’s recommendations?

A. “Nice try,” but no dice. Neumann said he neither could nor would describe the recommendations.

Q. Could Neumann give an idea of the Reagan administration’s policy orientation, for example, as between military security and third world development concerns?

A. The administration would have a “nationalistic” view, not in an isolationist sense, but in regard to what was conceived to be in the national interest. For example, American national interest would be the yardstick on decisions made in regard to a hypothetical country where there was contention between a neolithic right, a communist-infiltrated left, and a “Kerensky-like” middle. The campaign did stress military security, and there was reason to do so given the previous administration’s “appalling” neglect of the military. The Reagan administration’s thinking embraced the political use of military force.

⁶ See “Two Transition Teams End Operations Early,” New York Times, p. A12 and Michael Getler, “Haig Dismisses State Transition Team,” Washington Post, pp. A1, A3; both December 24, 1980. In his memoir, Haig recounted: “When, on my second day as Secretary of State-designate, I dismissed Neumann’s transition team, I had no ulterior motive whatsoever. The team’s final report was due on Monday. It was delivered to me on that day. I read it, noted its many excellences, including a provocative essay by Myer Rashish on economic policy, and called the team together on Tuesday to thank them and bid them Godspeed. A transition team is designed to get you from one point to the next; it is not by definition an enduring institution.” Haig noted that he had asked six of the team members—Burt, Crocker, Neumann, McFarlane, Wolfowitz, and Rashish—to stay on in the Department. He asserted that “by informing Neumann’s team that its mission had been accomplished, I became a sort of culture hero. Headlines proclaimed that I had ‘dismissed’ Neumann and his people and, by implication, had saved the State Department from ideological thuggery.” (Haig, Caveat, pp. 71–72)

20. Editorial Note

President Ronald Reagan presaged an American renewal and a strengthened global leadership role in his inaugural address, delivered on January 20, 1981: “On the eve of our struggle for independence a man who might have been one of the greatest among the Founding Fathers, Dr. Joseph Warren, president of the Massachusetts Congress, said to his fellow Americans, ‘Our country is in danger, but not to be despaired of . . . On you depend the fortunes of America. You are to decide the important questions upon which rests the happiness and the liberty of millions yet unborn. Act worthy of yourselves.’

“Well, I believe we, the Americans of today, are ready to act worthy of ourselves, ready to do what must be done to ensure happiness and liberty for ourselves, our children, and our children’s children. And as we renew ourselves here in our own land, we will be seen as having greater strength throughout the world. We will again be the exemplar of freedom and a beacon of hope for those who do not now have freedom.

“To those neighbors and allies who share our freedom, we will strengthen our historic ties and assure them of our support and firm commitment. We will match loyalty with loyalty. We will strive for mutually beneficial relations. We will not use our friendship to impose on their sovereignty, for our own sovereignty is not for sale.

“As for the enemies of freedom, those who are potential adversaries, they will be reminded that peace is the highest aspiration of the American people. We will negotiate for it, sacrifice for it; we will not surrender for it, now or ever.

“Our forbearance should never be misunderstood. Our reluctance for conflict should not be misjudged as a failure of will. When action is required to preserve our national security, we will act. We will maintain sufficient strength to prevail if need be, knowing that if we do so we have the best chance of never having to use that strength.

“Above all, we must realize that no arsenal or no weapon in the arsenals of the world is so formidable as the will and moral courage of free men and women. It is a weapon our adversaries in today’s world do not have. It is a weapon that we as Americans do have. Let that be understood by those who practice terrorism and prey upon their neighbors.” (Public Papers: Reagan, 1981, page 3) The complete text of Reagan’s address is ibid., pages 1–4.

President Reagan spoke at noon from the West Front of the Capitol. Immediately preceding the address Chief Justice of the United States Warren E. Burger administered the oath of office. Reagan’s address was broadcast live on nationwide radio and television networks. In his personal diary entry for January 20, the President characterized the day: "The Inaugural (Jan. 20) was an emotional experience but then the very next day it was 'down to work.' The first few days were long and hard—daily Cabinet meetings interspersed with sessions with Congressional leaders regarding our ec. plan." (Brinkley, ed., The Reagan Diaries, volume I, January 1981–October 1985, page 15)

Presidential Telephone Call to Heads of Allied Governments

On January 21, the President completed calls to six Allied Heads of State: Prime Minister Pierre Elliott Trudeau of Canada, Prime Minister Arnaldo Forlani of Italy, Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher of the United Kingdom, President Valéry Giscard d'Estaing of France, Chancellor Helmut Schmidt of the Federal Republic of Germany and Prime Minister Zenko Suzuki of Japan.

The calls lasted uniformly less than five minutes, and during the course of the conversation the President indicated that he looked forward to working with the Allied leaders on problems of mutual concern to the United States and the respective countries. Highlights of the calls are:

Canada—Our countries share an historic friendship. The President attached great importance to close relations between the United States and Canada, with cooperation between the two countries a priority for the Administration. The President looks forward to meeting with Prime Minister Trudeau at an early date.

The President's Daily Diary does not contain an entry for January 21; there is no indication as to when precisely the telephone calls took place. (Reagan Library, President's Daily Diary) The memorandum is also scheduled for publication in Foreign Relations, 1981–1988, vol. VII, Western Europe, 1981–1984.

Italy—The Administration intends to consult closely and regularly with friends such as Italy. The common heritage and shared values of the people of the United States and Italy are very close, and it is the responsibility of leaders to see that the relationship remains close and cordial.²

United Kingdom—Emphasizing the special importance that is attached to the relationship between our countries, the President thanked Mrs. Thatcher for her message of congratulations.³ It is necessary to work closely on mutual problems, and the President said that he and Mrs. Reagan are especially looking forward to welcoming the Prime Minister to Washington next month (February 25–28).⁴ The President also asked the Prime Minister to thank the Queen for the message in connection with the release of the hostages.⁵

France—The relationship between France and the United States is vital for the two countries, and a close and cooperative relationship is of central importance to our security. It is hoped that an early meeting will take place, but in the meantime, “We can use the telephone for any conversation.” The President indicated he looks forward to the opportunity to meet with Prime Minister Barre and Foreign Minister Francois-Poncet, who will be paying an official visit to Washington on February 21–23 to meet with Secretary Haig.⁶

Germany—The President conveyed to Chancellor Schmidt that the Senate had confirmed Secretary Haig 93–6, noting that Secretary Haig is a close friend of the Chancellor. He expressed his intention to work closely with Chancellor Schmidt, to build on the close ties between our governments and peoples. He indicated that Secretary Haig had told of Foreign Minister Genscher’s plans for a visit in March, recalled meeting with him in November, said he would look forward to seeing him when ⁵The Queen’s message has not been found. On Inauguration Day, the 52 remaining hostages in Tehran were released. Speaking at the beginning of the January 21 Cabinet meeting, the President stated: “But in case no one has given you an update, President Carter and Mondale, Muskie, and the others he took with him are due to land in Germany within the hour to greet our returning POW’s. All last night I got out of the habit of calling them hostages. I called them prisoners of war.” (Weekly Compilation of Presidential Documents, January 26, 1981, vol. 17, no. 4, p. 30)

he was here.⁷ There was brief mention of the forthcoming Economic Summit Conference in Ottawa (July).⁸

Japan—The President's five minute discussion with Prime Minister Suzuki stressed the close alliance between Japan and the United States. The President indicated he looks forward to working with and seeing Prime Minister Suzuki.⁹

These highlights are for your background, and it would seem appropriate for you to characterize the calls in general terms without reference to the specifics mentioned here.

⁷ Haig met with Genscher on March 9. In telegram 63158 to Bonn, March 12, the Department transmitted a summary of the meeting, stating that it "focussed as expected on questions of East-West relations, with particular emphasis on arms control issues." Miyazawa said Prime Minister told President he would like to visit U.S. for talks at earliest mutually convenient time and President replied he hoped to see Suzuki as soon as possible in order to discuss many issues of common interest." Secretary's Meeting with Chairman Zablocki and Ranking Member Broomfield, January 23, 1981, 2:30 p.m., Secretary's Office

Secretary Haig met today with the leaders of the House Foreign Relations Committee—Chairman Zablocki and Congressman Broomfield.

Also present at the meeting were Richard Fairbanks (H), Bill Clark (D), Mike Rashish (E).

The meeting began with the Secretary expressing his appreciation for past support that he had received from Chairman Zablocki on matters such as the Greece/Turkey situation. Both Congressmen stated that they had worked together for many years in a bipartisan manner on their Committee and that they were both prepared, indeed eager, to work with the new Administration.

The Secretary observed that he wished his confirmation hearing could have been split between the Senate and the House Committees.² Zablocki responded that, despite the good relations among the three principals, there would be many tough times in his Committee because both he and Broomfield were out of step with the philosophy of the majority of the members. As an example, he cited the criticism he had taken from many members for his support of arms for El Salvador.

The Secretary told the leaders of his deep concern about the situation in Poland.³ He said he thought it was important to show the Soviets that the U.S. Government, despite the distractions of a change in Administration and the return of the prisoners, is not unaware of opposition moves nor incapable of response. He said that he considered Poland “the number one potential trouble spot in the world.”

Broomfield observed that meetings with the House leadership had been an effective tool for Secretaries Vance and Muskie and hoped that Secretary Haig would continue them on a regular basis. The Secretary promised that he would and underlined his view that continuing their open communications is key to a good relationship between the two branches of government.

Chairman Zablocki invited the Secretary to meet with the members of the House Committee on February 10 for coffee on Capitol Hill. H is to arrange this with the Committee Staff Director, Jack Brady.

Both leaders stressed that the House calendar puts them under some pressure to schedule budget hearings in that they must inform the Budget Committee of their targets by March 15. The Chairman has made it his practice to have his Committee be the first to complete its authorization bill so as to insulate foreign aid from log-rolling political considerations.⁴ The Secretary and the leaders jointly agreed that we are facing a tough federal budget situation and that we must work together to preserve effective aid spending, particularly because it is an easy target due to lack of a domestic political constituency.

³ Presumable reference to Poland’s continued economic crisis and labor unrest, in addition to the buildup of Soviet forces along the Polish border.

Chairman Zablocki pleaded for a continuation of his “baby”—IDCA—because the “poor child is only a year old and hasn’t yet begun to shave.”⁵ The Secretary stated that the transition team’s reorganizations were being studied but no decision had been made and recommended that the leaders talk to Jim Buckley.

The Secretary said that the IDA replenishment⁶ will be very tough to get through OMB. It has not yet been addressed at the Cabinet level and he has asked the Director of OMB to slow down budget decisions on programs that have foreign policy implications. Director Stockman has agreed to do so.

Zablocki said that the State/NSC relationship is critical, that it undercut the effectiveness of the Carter foreign policy and that he was glad to see the Secretary of State established as the primary spokesman.

Broomfield said that a new balance on human rights as a component of our foreign policy was needed and he and the Secretary agreed that the concern of international terrorism would rise in importance and human rights would recede soon. With regard to the organization of human rights within the State Department, the Secretary asked for the Congressmen’s assistance in getting rid of a separate office for that problem and returning it to the various bureaus.⁷ Zablocki said that he was sympathetic but that he had already lost an earlier attempt to do away with a subcommittee targeted to that concern in his own committee.⁸

⁶ Reference is to the sixth round of International Development Association (IDA) replenishment negotiations, permitting the IDA to meet with its membership in order to secure additional funds to be used for loan assistance to developing nations, which were completed in December 1979. Donors, including the United States, approved a replenishment of $12 billion, with the United States contributing $3.24 billion in three installments. The outlay period for IDA–VI was 1981–1983. (Congress and the Nation, vol. VI, 1981–1984, p. 132) Documentation on the completion of the negotiations is in Foreign Relations, 1977–1980, vol. III, Foreign Economic Policy. Ultimately, the U.S. appropriations for IDA–VI were contained within the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1981 (H.R. 3982; P.L. 97–35; 95 Stat.357), which the President signed into law on August 13.

Broomfield stated that congressional liaison was a cardinaly important function and that the members of the House were delighted with the selection of Max Friedersdorf in the White House. He looked askance at Richard Fairbanks and said that he hoped that he would be able to say the same thing about State. Fairbanks spoke of his desire to increase the seniority and visibility of liaison officers who were “forward deployed” in both the House and the Senate. The Secretary stressed his personal commitment to good congressional relations and said it was his view that everything in the policy area unravels without it. He also said that if you have foreign policy successes, in a crisis you will get the quick and bipartisan backing that you need.

Subsequent to the meeting, the two leaders requested that copies of the photographs that were taken at the start of the meeting be autographed by the Secretary before they are sent to them.

⁸ Presumable reference to the House Subcommittee on Human Rights and International Organizations.

23. Memorandum From Secretary of State Haig to President Reagan¹

[Omitted here is information unrelated to the press conference and Clark’s confirmation.]

2. Press Conference: My first formal press conference took place this afternoon and it went well. The questions covered the horizon, a good number of them on relations with the Soviet Union, with our principal allies, and our policy towards the Middle East.

I took the opportunity to make a couple of points:

¹ Source: Reagan Library, Executive Secretariat, NSC Agency File, Secretary Haig’s Evening Report (01/22/1981–02/03/1981). Confidential. The complete transcript of the press conference is printed in Department of State Bulletin, February 1981, pp. G–K.

—Your Administration is not prepared to consider providing arms of any kind, under any circumstances, to the present Government of Iran;

—Our commitment to Israel's security is absolute, but we will be looking for ways to move the peace process forward in the Middle East;

—We will not deal with the PLO in any way as long as they continue their support for terrorism, do not accept Israel's right to a peaceful existence, and refuse to recognize the appropriate UN resolutions as the basis for peace talks;

—Finally, I stressed that we mean business in dealing with terrorism; we're very concerned about human rights and basic issues of human dignity, but international terrorism is the number one problem right now.

It's interesting to note that 30 minutes after the end of the press conference, TASS (the Soviet news agency) called with a question about terrorism, indicating that at least one customer picked up the message. (LOU)

3. Confirmation of Bill Clark: Bill has nearly completed his rounds of courtesy calls with members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. His hearing is scheduled to begin next Monday, February 2 at 10:00 a.m.² The opposition appears to be diminishing, with the possible exception of liberal Senators Biden and Kennedy. Bill is meeting with Biden tomorrow afternoon. Cranston has agreed to join Hayakawa in presenting Bill to the Committee, which is a real plus. Unfortunately, Cranston will not be in town Monday to do it personally, but Justice Stanley Mosk of the California Supreme Court—a noted liberal who is highly respected among the Democrats—will be in town to speak on his behalf at the hearing. 24. Editorial Note

On January 28, 1981, Secretary of Defense Caspar Weinberger testified before the Senate Armed Services Committee, meeting in open session, on the fiscal year (FY) 1982 defense authorization request (S. 815). Following opening remarks made by Committee Chair Senator John Tower (R–Texas), Weinberger underscored what he described as a “growing imbalance in our strategic forces,” asserting that “for quite too long a period we have not had, I think, sufficient resources assigned to defense.” After noting the Soviet military buildup that had taken place, while previous administrations had pursued other priorities, he continued: “I think my predecessor summed it up well when Secretary Brown said ‘When we build they build. When we stop they build.’ As long as I am Secretary of Defense I want to assure you starting from the first day in office we will build enough and I hope in time to redress the inferior position that we now occupy. It seems to me that our commitment to build and our actual undertaking of the task is the best way to get the Soviets to stop. What we must do now, I think, is to get on with the job of adding to our military strength as quickly and as efficiently as we can.

“As I mentioned before, I have two highest priorities in rearming America—you might say three. One is to improve the readiness of the forces in being. The second is to redress the imbalances that have developed in our strategic and theater nuclear forces and the third is to make sure that those forces that are ready are indeed modernized and able to be used most effectively. The primary purpose of the military force, of course, is to be able to conduct successfully the missions assigned to it. I am afraid that few, if any, of our potential adversaries will ever be deterred if our ships can’t get underway, or our planes cannot fly, or our front line combat divisions have equipment problems, or if we do not have the lift to move our forces and so on.”

Asserting that the main reason for the nation’s “readiness difficulties” was the “lack of skilled people,” Weinberger argued the need for better military compensation. He continued: “I think readiness can be increased by providing more funds for spare parts, training and consumables. These are not very glamorous items, not very strong constituencies behind them, but they are enormously important and they will receive a lot of emphasis from our administration. With respect to the highest priority, increasing the level of investment in the strategic area, I think that it is essential to begin and begin now because the rest of the world, our allies as well as non-aligned countries and potential adversaries, count on and look first of all to the United States to maintain that strategic nuclear balance and, in the case of adversaries, look constantly to see whether we are continuing to do so. If these nations detect any weakening in the United States resolve to maintain that strategic umbrella, they either accommodate themselves to the dominant strategic power or the dominant strategic power will receive too much encouragement from our failure to maintain the balance.

“It becomes also very difficult, if not impossible, for us to employ or risk using our conventional forces—or to conduct diplomacy successfully—if we do not have any kind of satisfactory and correctly perceived satisfactory nuclear strategic balance. An enhanced nuclear posture also offers our best hope of negotiating a meaningful arms control agreement with the Soviet Union. We must negotiate with the Soviets from a position of strength and I am confident that as we improve our strategic posture we can simultaneously enhance the prospect for a new SALT agreement.”

Weinberger then discussed the administration’s specific spending priorities, his managerial philosophy, his department’s role in the policy making process, and the staffing of his department. He concluded his remarks by asserting: “Working together with you, Mr. Chairman, and your committee, I am confident we can rebuild our defenses with strength and firmness of purpose that cannot be misunderstood by anyone.” (Department of Defense Authorization for Appropriations for Fiscal Year 1982: Hearings Before the Committee on Armed Services, United States Senate, Ninety-Seventh Congress, First Session, on S. 815, Part I, Posture Statement, Secretary of Defense Caspar Weinberger, General David C. Jones, Chairman, Joint Chiefs of Staff, Budget Amendments, January 28, March 4, 1981, pages 10–14)

25. Editorial Note

At his first press conference, held in Room 450 of the Old Executive Office Building on January 29, 1981, at 4 p.m., and broadcast live on nationwide radio and television networks, President Ronald Reagan discussed the goals and intentions of the Soviet Union, in response to a question posed by American Broadcasting Company (ABC) News correspondent Sam Donaldson: “Mr. President, what do you see as the long-range intentions of the Soviet Union? Do you think, for instance, the Kremlin is bent on world domination that might lead to a continuation of the cold war, or do you think that under other circumstances détente is possible?”

Reagan replied: “Well, so far détente’s been a one-way street that the Soviet Union has used to pursue its own aims. I don’t have to think of an answer as to what I think their intentions are; they have repeated it. I know of no leader of the Soviet Union since the revolution, and including the present leadership, that has not more than once repeated in the various Communist congresses they hold their determination that their goal must be the promotion of world revolution and a one-world Socialist or Communist state, whichever word you want to use.

“Now, as long as they do that and as long as they, at the same time, have openly and publicly declared that the only morality they recognize is what will further their cause, meaning they reserve unto themselves the right to commit any crime, to lie, to cheat, in order to attain that, and that is moral, not immoral, and we operate on a different set of standards, I think when you do business with them, even at a détente, you keep that in mind.” (Public Papers: Reagan, 1981, page 57) The complete text of the news conference is ibid., pages 55–62.

Washington, January 29, 1981

SUBJECT

Relations with Soviet Ambassador Dobrynin

Your 1730 meeting today with Ambassador Dobrynin raises the more general point of how this Administration will conduct relations with the Soviet Union.² We would like to share some brief thoughts with you:

² For Haig’s summary of the meeting, see ibid., Document 9.

—As you know, their man in Washington has become a, if not the, key conduit for our communications with Moscow.

—Not only does it tend to undermine the position of our embassy and officials stationed in Moscow, but it allows the USSR to control the circuit.

—This tends as well to give them more access to us than vice-versa, a pattern which only exacerbates an imbalance already there owing to the fact that our society is so much more open than theirs.

Given this background, we would suggest that you make it clear from the outset that under your tenure US-Soviet relations will be conducted on the basis of strict reciprocity in form as well as substance. The Soviets should be made to understand not only that Dobrynin will no longer enjoy special status, but also that whatever status he does enjoy will depend upon equal treatment for his opposite number in Moscow. Such a point could be underlined by your declining any future meetings with Dobrynin until our Ambassador has had his first session of comparable duration and seriousness.³

There is another consideration as well. We question whether, over the long-term, it is wise to have Dobrynin remain in Washington. His position as dean of the diplomatic corps affords him a status which is unfortunate from our perspective. His contacts are all too broad and well-established.

In short, it is difficult to see how we benefit from having this often devious and always dangerous diplomat accredited to Washington. Getting him replaced in the next year or two should be a serious goal for us. By demonstrating to his masters that he no longer will enjoy special treatment or status, we may be taking an important first step to bring about his removal.

³NOTE: It should be made clear to Dobrynin that we do not expect reciprocity until we have an Ambassador of our own in Moscow. The caveat on future meetings with Dobrynin might therefore not arise for a little while. But this is the right occasion to make the point. [Footnote is in the original.]

Washington, February 5, 1981

SUBJECT

Talking Points for National Security Council Meeting Friday, February 6, 1981 from 1:30 to 2:20 p.m.²

The purpose of this session is to inaugurate the meetings of the National Security Council. It is anticipated that these meetings will occur as required but I estimate they will be every week or ten days. In addition to the statutory members of the National Security Council—the Vice President, the Secretary of State and the Secretary of Defense—Ed Meese and Jim Baker will also be members. In addition, the Director of Central Intelligence and the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff are statutory advisors to the National Security Council.

The meeting will be informational in nature, and the hour devoted to it will cover three topics:

- U.S. Policy toward the Caribbean Basin
- U.S. Policy toward Poland
- Future Topics for NSC Meetings

You may wish to include the following points in your opening remarks:

Talking Points

- The interagency working group procedures for the National Security Council are not yet complete, but I understand that these are being worked on and anticipate that these matters will be decided within the near future.

² An unknown hand crossed out "January" and wrote "February" below it to indicate that the meeting took place on February 6.

- I intend to have the National Security Council meet frequently. The National Security Council is a valuable institution, and I intend to make good use of it.

- I want members of the National Security Council and those directly associated with the NSC's work to function as a team. A team effort is important if we are to realize successful and sound policies for this Administration. To that end, I urge cooperation at all levels, and I ask that no one stand on bureaucratic ceremony, since there is so much that needs to be done.

- During the campaign I pledged to formulate and implement a new foreign policy for the United States. I consider our foreign policy to be a key ingredient of our national security, and I will look to this forum to advise me in that regard.

— Of equal importance is our defense policy. The smooth integration of these two key areas, along with considerations bearing on intelligence, international economic issues, trade issues and energy issues, will guarantee the success of our policy.

- The intelligence community is a vital component of our national security, and I am dedicated to the task of restoring the vigor and effectiveness of the intelligence community. That is one reason why I am so pleased to have Bill Casey as Director of Central Intelligence.³ He is a team player, and I know he shares the urgency of this mission.

- During the campaign I frequently spoke of the need to “restore the margin of safety.” That means providing this nation with the best military establishment in the world.

— I am intent upon implementing those pledges, and I particularly welcome the opportunity to work with General David Jones, the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, for the purpose of achieving that objective. We will be seeing a great deal of General Jones, and I welcome his cooperation with the members of the NSC and with our staff.

- Once I have made a decision, I will expect the departments and agencies to implement it smoothly and without hesitation. I know I can count on your close cooperation in this regard.

— We will work through Ed Meese, Counselor to the President, and we will establish “tracking mechanisms” to ensure that our teamwork produces the desired results.

- Among the specific pledges made during my campaign, none could be more important than the communication of our policy in clear, concise and understandable language. I believe that we have a great communications opportunity, not only within the United States but also for the rest of the world.

— In order to build the consensus we need, the American message must be told effectively and repeatedly. In that connection, I will shortly be making appointments in those agencies concerned with communicating our policy.⁴

- Beyond the formal members of the National Security Council, we will frequently be calling other members of the Cabinet and sub-Cabinet to assist us in our endeavors.

— While the National Security Council will not become another Cabinet exercise, it is imperative that we take account of the needs of many agencies to participate in our work, if only because they are affected by the decisions that will emerge from the National Security Council framework.

- The decisions will be mine, but your advice and close cooperation will be the basis for good decisions.

— While I recognize that there will be disagreements, and while I will insist upon hearing all points of view, once the decisions are made we should all pull together to implement them.

- The National Security Council staff will function as an integral part of the White House and will be available to assist in the coordination of the matters that come before this body. Since all of you know and have worked with Dick Allen, you also know that he places high value on the smooth management of these affairs. Dick is working closely with Ed Meese and Jim Baker and he will have the task of seeing that these meetings accomplish the objectives which we set for them.

- Now, I would like to call on Dick to give us an overview of today’s agenda.

⁴On March 6, the President indicated that he planned to nominate Wick to head the International Communication Agency. (“Reagan Friend Named to Post,” New York Times, March 7, 1981, p. 10)

PUTTING THE MIDDLE EAST PEACE PROCESS
IN A BROADER CONTEXT

We have important reasons for putting the peace process in the broader context of the threats we face in the area and our strategy for countering these threats. Perhaps, our most important reason is that Soviet threats to the region of both a direct and indirect nature are increasing. The size and increased readiness of Soviet forces along their Southern frontier, the erosion of "Northern Tier" barriers to Soviet expansion into the area, the growth in Soviet power projection capabilities, the development of Soviet military presence in and around the periphery of the region (in Ethiopia, PDRY, and Afghanistan), the potential significance of this presence,² and the multiplicity of coercive instruments at the Soviet disposal, are building Soviet leverage within the region—something that can only increase the likelihood of local and allied accommodation to Soviet interests in the Middle East and elsewhere. While we have taken some important first steps, we need to do much more if we are to counter Soviet threats, reassure local countries against Soviet or Soviet-inspired coercion, and restore regional confidence in us.

What needs to be done can not wait the resolution of Palestinian grievances or the final disposition of Jerusalem. Indeed, rather than thinking that progress on these issues must precede forward movement on a regional strategy, we need to think about how fostering a sense of urgency about the Soviet threat, and projecting a sense of seriousness about countering it, can facilitate the peace process and also protect our vital interests in the area.

Herein, we need to recognize that putting the Middle East peace process in the proper perspective, linking it to our broader concerns and objectives in the area, and taking steps that demonstrate our seriousness about securing our regional interests can do much to:

1. Facilitate the willingness of the Arabs and Israelis to make concessions and take risks for peace. In tactical terms, it is easier for the U.S. to ask for concessions—and, indeed, for local countries to make them—if the concessions are presented as preconditions for an anti-Soviet effort and are clearly tied to serious efforts to improve regional security. For the Israelis, in particular, pressing for concessions because the Arabs require them or because they are “right,” will count for very little—and indeed, may even be counterproductive. However, pressing for concessions within the context of a regional strategy to counter the one threat the Israelis can’t handle on their own, i.e., the Soviet one, is likely to count for much more—especially if it is clear that the Israelis will play a major role in this strategy and that we recognize the importance of Israeli military strength in making this strategy work. From the Israeli standpoint, not making concessions in these circumstances may actually jeopardize their overall security position and, in any case, may be politically costly to resist.

In more strategic terms, focusing on the threats and actively working to restore the military balance in the area will make it easier for the countries that are disposed toward making peace to do so. So long as the Soviets or their friends (including at this point the PLO) can engage in coercion or blackmail and the U.S. or others can do little about it, there is little prospect that the Saudis, Jordanians, or Israelis will feel able to run the necessary risks for peace. In effect, if we want the locals to make concessions, we must first create a secure environment which makes it safe for them to do so.³

Creating a secure environment is also especially important for the Saudis. The Saudis feel threatened from within and without, are sensitive to the political costs of association with us, and are not convinced that we won’t desert them in their hour of need. Until and unless they have confidence in us and believe that we or others can protect them from internal as well as external threats, they are unlikely to support any peace agreements that potentially put them in an exposed position—regardless of the progress that may have been made on Palestinian rights in these agreements.

2. Overcome the myth that if we resolve the Palestinian problem, we will resolve our basic problems in the area. This is a myth that both the Europeans and a number of Arab states have found convenient to promote. In the European case, promoting this notion⁴ seemed useful for winning favor with the Arabs and also for minimizing the need for a greatly increased Western defense effort and presence in the region. The latter is held to be true because it is assumed that the Arabs are basically anti-Soviet, and their anti-Soviet tendencies—if not clouded by the Palestinian problem—will naturally induce them to come together and create a bulwark against Soviet expansion in the area. In effect, such a bulwark would keep the Soviets out, preserve our interests in the region, and allow us all to solve our problems in the Gulf on the cheap.

Apart from the obvious anti-Western sentiment that remains in much of the Islamic world, this assumption fails on several grounds; it ignores the significance of Soviet power and the new “facts” or “realities” it can create; the respect local leaders have traditionally had for power and those who wield it; the willingness of locals to accommodate themselves to the powerful; and the ideological and personal rivalries and conflicts in the area which are sure to render any broad anti-Soviet Moslem coalition illusory at best.

Reminding the Europeans of the new realities in the Middle East that have changed the political-military calculus in the area and made us all far more vulnerable (i.e., an Iran that is a questionable buffer, a Soviet presence in Afghanistan, on the Iran-Iraq war,⁵ the siege at Mecca,⁶ etc.) is essential. These new realities haven’t been caused by the Palestinians and they won’t be ameliorated by a resolution of the Palestinian problem—even if one were readily available. The point is not to convince the Europeans that we need not address the Palestinian issue; rather the point is to persuade them that their old “truths” for dealing with the area need revision and that the Palestinian question and the peace process as a whole must be put in perspective. More than anything else, this means embedding the peace process in the context of the urgent threats we face in the area and recognizing that Arab-Israeli peace must be an important part of our strategy, but it can and must not be a substitute for it.

It is, of course, easier to make these points than it is to convince the Europeans and the local states of them. Even if,⁷ they believe them to be true, they are not about to expose themselves to the risks that may accompany their acceptance—unless, of course, we are able to convince them of our sense of purpose, our willingness to expose ourselves to the kind of risk we are asking others to run, and our capability to carry through on the commitments we make.

Aside from taking unilateral steps to improve our military capabilities, one way to communicate our seriousness on these issues may be to engage the relevant European countries and local Middle Eastern states in bilateral strategic dialogues. We could use these dialogues to explain our view of the new threat realities in the region and what we are doing to cope with them; we could also use the dialogues to explore with our allies how they think we, collectively, should respond to the pressing threats in the area and how they perceive their own and others' roles.

At a minimum, these discussions should help to embed the peace process in a broader strategic context. Beyond this, these discussions—though varying in scope and character with the different countries—could build our credibility and provide the foundation on which a regional security framework for the Middle East can be built.⁸ Indeed, what may start out as a series of bilateral discussions and resulting arrangements could over time turn into overlapping or multilateral discussions and arrangements. At any rate, that should probably be one of our long-term goals.⁹

To sum up, our current strategic position in the Middle East requires that we emphasize and take steps to confront the growing Soviet threat in the area. Making the Soviet threat our primary concern (and placing the Middle East peace process in this context) is necessary from the standpoint of protecting our vital interests in the region. By providing us a useful fulcrum on which to justify mutual concessions, it may also prove useful in resolving Arab-Israeli differences.

⁸ Given Saudi sensitivities, we may find it mutually convenient—at least initially—to avoid certain subjects with the Saudis—e.g., Israel's role in Gulf contingencies. Alternatively this may be a subject that we agree to disagree on. Here the point would be that we are not going to force them to cooperate with the Israelis, but by the same token they can not prevent us from doing so if we deem that the military realities in the area dictate such cooperation. [Footnote is in the original.]

29. Editorial Note

In telegram 35565 to Paris, February 11, 1981, the Department of State indicated that Secretary of State Alexander Haig would appear on a French television program during French Foreign Minister Jean Francois-Poncet's visit to Washington on February 23. The Department continued, "Program will be special edition of 'Cartes sur Tables' to be broadcast evening of Feb 23 on Antenne 2. It will consist of replies by Francois-Poncet and the Secretary to questions posed by Alain Duhamel and Jean-Pierre Elkabach. Two interviews will be recorded separately and melded for broadcast." (Department of State, Central Foreign Policy File, Electronic Telegrams, D810066-0546)

During the February 23 interview, which took place at the Department of State, Haig addressed developments in U.S.-Soviet relations since President Ronald Reagan's Inauguration, noting President Reagan's desire for consistency in the conduct of foreign affairs. The interviewers asked: "Do you have the impression that the fact of having spoken loudly, strongly since the new Administration started has had a positive effect on the Soviet Union?"

Haig responded: "I think it's much too early to tell, but clearly this Administration—President Reagan—has felt that it is vitally important that the United States enter into a period of greater consistency in the conduct of our affairs abroad with both our friends and allies, members of the nonaligned states, as well as those of the Soviet bloc.

"He also feels that the United States must project an image of relevancy. There has been at least the appearance of what I've referred to as the 'Vietnam syndrome' where many of our friends have been confused, befuddled, and fearful that we have, in that post-Vietnam experience, tended to withdraw from the world. And we've also talked about balance. By balance I mean a clear recognition of the great number of contradictions that involve solutions to any particular problem area—the need to integrate political, economic, and security aspects of these problems."

After Haig responded to questions on a variety of topics, including the possibility of a U.S.-Soviet summit, Poland, Latin America, Afghanistan, arms control, the U.S.-Soviet nuclear balance, and the state of U.S.-French relations, the interviewers posed one final question regarding the ideological underpinnings of U.S. foreign policy: "Should the United States have, as an idea in its foreign policy—in other words, since a general is at the head of the State Department, are you going to have a 'big stick' type of policy? This is at least the image of U.S. foreign policy now that many people in Europe seem to have."

Haig replied: "I understand that one of my background might bring forth those perceptions, but I think also that one who has participated personally in two wars in my lifetime recognizes the great sacrifices that anguishing human consequences of conflict bring to the mix of statecraft a heightened concern and a very sensitive feel for the need for peacekeeping efforts and international stability, but they also bring forth a sharp sensitivity to the consequences of unpreparedness and weakness, vacillation and inconsistency. If that is 'big stick,' I'm afraid the arsenal is out."

The interviewers responded: "So you're not a hawk?"

Haig answered: "I think these labels are sometimes misleading. I have no doubt that whether you be a hawk or a dove, you both seek the same thing—peace. The problem is how best to achieve it. And I believe that our strength is the most important guarantee of our ability to maintain international peace and stability." (Department of State Bulletin, April 1981, pages 13–17)

Head of New Foreign Office, Nicholas Fenn
Minister, Embassy Washington, Mr. John Fretwell

The President reiterated the pleasure he felt in receiving Mrs. Thatcher. Alluding to the restricted meeting which they had just concluded,² the President emphasized that there would be no surprises in our conduct of foreign policy and that the excellent relationship which we have had with Great Britain for many years would be further strengthened through close consultation. The President said that he and the Prime Minister had touched on a number of trouble spots during their earlier meeting, including the Middle East and Central America. (U)

Prime Minister Thatcher noted that there were three main subjects that she and the President had scarcely dealt with. The first of these was connected with the main issue of East-West relations, including the tactics of handling those relations in light of Brezhnev's speech,³ the question of Poland, where the UK felt that the danger had not yet passed and where the Communist system was confronted with a situation it could not tolerate. A second subject concerned events in Central America and South America where the United States had specialized information; the Prime Minister stated that she and her associates would profit from any views the President might wish to share with them on that subject. She noted that the non-aligned nations were against Cuba; they resent the fact that Cuba did not condemn the Soviet Union for their actions in Afghanistan and it is important that the West continue to benefit from that important development. A third important subject concerned the world recession. In that connection, the Prime Minister noted that she and the President would be going to Ottawa in July and will confront the problem of monopoly fixing of oil and judgments about what kind of relationships we can have with the countries responsible for that monopoly. The Prime Minister went on to say there was a fourth subject which occurred to her; and that concerned the possibility of a Mexican Summit. The Prime Minister said she felt that too many things were coming at once on the international agenda and it might be well to postpone a Mexico Summit. The British would prefer to go to Ottawa first, then have the other summit later. The Prime Minister said that it would be helpful if the United States could support such a postponement. The Prime Minister added that she knew how important Central America and South America were to us and how much we are exercised by developments there. (C)

The President replied that so far as Central America was concerned, he felt that it was part of the whole international problem we face today. The villain there is the same villain we face in so many other places: the export of subversion. The United States with the best of intentions over the past years has tried a variety of programs with our neighbors to the South. But too many of these programs were undertaken without enough sensitivity for the feelings of the people living there, so many of whom felt intimidated by the Colossus of the North. Our intentions were good, but the plans were ours, and people felt that the plans were being imposed on them. The United States wants to try a new approach. We want to bind these two continents together in a love of freedom. Our approach will not be imposing ideas from the outside. The President referred to his meeting with Mexican President Lopez Portillo, and explained that his approach to that meeting was to listen to the Mexican President's ideas.⁴ The meeting was very warm and it broke through a number of barriers. The President said he did not realize to what extent the barriers had been broken until he received as a personal gift from the Mexican President a horse. The Mexican President's awareness that riding was very important to the President resulted in a symbolic gesture of great significance.

The President knows something about Lopez Portillo's interests and attitudes, and if there is a movement to postpone a Mexican Summit because of a crowded schedule, the President would rather that such an effort come from somewhere else. We have established a beach-head in Mexico. We have overcome a good deal of suspicion which begins at the level of school children. We have made many gains in our relationship with the Mexicans. (C)

Prime Minister Thatcher responded that the actual timing for a Mexican Summit will be determined by the President's availability. From what the President had just told her, she could see that having placed the US relationship with Mexico on a new basis, he would not wish to jeopardize that new relationship. It seemed clear that the President had made up his mind to go to a Mexican Summit, a view that she could quite understand. It is currently scheduled for June 11–13, and will be something of a global discussion, quite unstructured.⁵ (C)

Secretary Haig emphasized that Summit tactics will be awfully important. It is essential that the West be together, that it present a solid, coherent, unified front. Castro will be there. If there were any possibility of delaying the Mexican Summit, it would be a good idea to do so. (C)

The Prime Minister noted that since aid to the Third World will be on the Ottawa Summit agenda, it would make sense for Ottawa to be a precursor to Mexico. If expectations are built up in the Third World over prospective accomplishments in Mexico and then nothing comes of them, this would be a bad thing for the West. (C)

Lord Carrington interjected that having talked to both Parr and Kreisky he had the strong impression that they would be very happy to postpone such a summit provided the United States in principle planned to attend. (C)

The President suggested that we should be in communication immediately with Lopez Portillo to determine if he could see his way clear to hosting a summit in the fall rather than in June. (C)

The Prime Minister added that the meeting would be very interesting. Some members of the Group of 77 will be there, oil-rich countries who are better off than the United Kingdom. A sponsors meeting will be held in Vienna in mid-March and some indication of participants and timing will be sought at that meeting.⁶ (C)

⁵ The summit did not take place in June but in October; see Documents 65 and 68.

The President turned to Secretary Haig and told him that we should communicate to Lopez Portillo our intention to attend the Mexico Summit and to determine if it can be held in the fall. The President said he had another border meeting with Lopez Portillo scheduled for late April,⁷ but we would need to communicate with him about a Mexican Summit before then. (C)

Prime Minister Thatcher asked the President if he had considered what kind of fundamental response to be given to Brezhnev's proposal for a meeting. The Prime Minister said that she can anticipate being close-questioned on this subject every Tuesday and Thursday in the House of Commons. It is recognized, of course, that one simply cannot say "no, we will never talk". In the back of every one's mind there is the idea of "yes, of course, we must talk", but we cannot talk until every problem, every possible pitfall is carefully examined. The Soviets are skilled negotiators. We can expect them to play on the peace-loving sympathies of people. She was struck, for example, by the reference to a moratorium on Theatre Nuclear Forces.⁸ The Prime Minister said that her attitude is that when you sup with the devil you must have a long spoon. In fact you had better have a whole lot of long spoons. (C)

The President emphasized that we will be giving the proposal careful study and that we would not simply sit down at a table to discuss a single issue such as disarmament. We will want to discuss a whole lot of other things too, for example, Soviet backing of Cuban subversion. (C)

Prime Minister Thatcher agreed that enormous preparation would be required before such a meeting could take place. The answer should be "yes, in due course". (C)

The President replied that this is the position we've taken; not a no, not a yes—we are considering it very carefully. (C)

The Vice President asked the Prime Minister for clarification concerning the kinds of questions she was getting in Parliament, including the extent to which Afghanistan figures in them. (C)

The Prime Minister identified three parts of the Brezhnev speech which she found noteworthy. The first was the call for a meeting, and in that connection the West should certainly prepare a careful position on the question of Soviet troops in Afghanistan and the necessity of having them removed. The Prime Minister also noted the proposal for a moratorium on Theatre Nuclear Forces, a proposal which did not surprise the British considering the imbalance which is now in the Soviets' favor. They currently have 200 missiles targeted on Central Europe and they are adding a new one every five days. Thirdly, the Prime Minister noted, there was mention of confidence-building measures, which is Giscard's great thing. The British position is if there are to be confidence-building measures, these must go back to the Urals. The Soviets are saying that if they go back to the Urals we must go back further too; however, we cannot go back any further—we would be in the sea! (laughter) (C)

⁸ In Haig's February 25 memorandum to the President (see footnote 3, above), he reported that Brezhnev had called for a moratorium on long-range TNF in Europe, a proposal that would benefit the Soviet Union. Haig wrote, "On TNF, we will continue to reaffirm our commitment to the two-track NATO approach to modernization of NATO LRTNF and negotiations for limiting LRTNF deployments."

The President said that in these circumstances it was well to remember the story about Kipling's Bear—he seemed so nice but! (U)

[Omitted here is discussion concerning Belize and El Salvador.]

Mr. Meese suggested that Secretary Haig might want to put our overall policy in Central America in perspective, underscoring the stand we are taking against outside interference in the affairs of other nations. (C)

Secretary Haig agreed and said that it was important that we not let El Salvador become a repeat of history where social issues are the core; rather we wish to focus attention on the external aspects of the problem, which is why we say it is necessary to take the problem to the source. We do not wish to become entangled in the bloody internal affairs of a Third World country. We are trying to prevent that. We are very conscious of European sensibilities, but governments under attack are in no position to effect reform if they are being besieged by armed force, no more than the Shan of Iran was able to make social progress in the midst of a revolution. We do have to help them shore up their institutions and cut off external involvement. Without such external involvement, we are reasonably confident that the government will both survive and prosper. Marxism is not an attractive alternative to the people of El Salvador. (C)

The President stated that proof that Marxist propaganda is false resides in the fact that the people have not risen up to support the guerrillas. (C)

Prime Minister Thatcher stated that additional facts about the subversion would be helpful—quantities of arms etc. (C)

Lord Carrington said that even the churches are in the propaganda battle now. (C)

Secretary Haig noted that we had some help recently from a Nicaraguan defector. He had been situated directly inside the Nicaraguan regime and has provided powerful confirmation of the Cuban-supported subversion of El Salvador. (C)

Prime Minister Thatcher expressed the plea that we do everything possible to exploit such inside information. (C)

The President noted that Prime Minister Seaga's victory in Jamaica was an encouraging thing.⁹ He pointed to an interesting bit of information which had recently developed there. There were signs of terrorism in Jamaica, and some of the weapons captured bore the same serial marks as those we left behind in Vietnam! There is obviously a central distribution point. The President expressed appreciation for British economic support to Jamaica and noted that David Rockefeller has agreed to lead a high-level mission to see what can be done to restore the Jamaican economy.¹⁰ The President concluded the meeting by inviting his British guests to help themselves to the jar of jellybeans on the Cabinet Room table. The President explained the presence of the jellybeans grew out of a period long before he thought he would ever be in public light. Jellybeans helped him give up smoking, and as a joke his wife had put a huge jar of them in the Cabinet table in Sacramento when he was Governor. They then caught on as kind of a trademark. The city of Los Angeles had presented the President with a large jar on the table before them now. It contains thirty-five different flavors, and were very useful for fueling Cabinet meetings. The company which produced the jellybeans had benefitted so much from the publicity that it regularly provided refills—proof that the President was truly conservative. He added that among the thirty-five flavors there was even a peanut butter flavor; he said if it were not so difficult sorting through the whole pile, he would of course remove that particular flavor (laughter). (C)

¹⁰ Rockefeller chaired the U.S. Business Committee on Jamaica. He was scheduled to visit Kingston in early March. In telegram 1970 from Kingston, March 10, the Embassy reported on the March 6 meeting between U.S. Business Committee representatives and representatives from the Prime Minister's Committee on Foreign Investment and Employment. (Department of State, Central Foreign Policy File, Electronic Telegrams, D810113–0391)

31. Editorial Note

On February 27, 1981, Secretary of State Alexander Haig offered remarks, concerning the Ronald Reagan administration's foreign assistance program, to reporters assembled at the Old Executive Office Building. After characterizing foreign assistance as a "very minor" but "vitally important" item within the larger federal budget, Haig noted that while the Department of State, cognizant of the need for overall budget reductions, had agreed to cut foreign aid, the United States would, nevertheless, "honor all of the commitments" it had made. He continued: "We are going to be able, we are confident, to preserve the humanitarian and developmental objectives of our overall aid program. And most importantly of all, we consider that we'll be able to meet the strategic objectives of the United States for which the aid program is itself conducted, on behalf of which.

"We anticipate that this is going to require the reductions that I've talked about—improved management of our foreign assistance programs, the elimination of a number of 'nice to have' but nonessential items, and in some instances the stretching out of obligatory payments within overall commitments that we found existed at the time we assumed responsibility.

"With respect to the last point—stretching out—I want to emphasize that we are in an evolutionary way tending toward greater emphasis on bilateral rather than multilateral assistance. Now we hope to do that, I emphasize again, in an evolutionary not a revolutionary way. That doesn't mean we're turning our backs on multilateral lending institutions and assistance institutions, hardly at all.

"But it's been our experience that we achieve greater precision and greater value to the American taxpayers if we emphasize bilateral assistance.

"This happens also to be very consistent with the Republican Party platform adopted and voted for by the American people. Why have we accepted this reduced burden, recognizing that foreign assistance has been the focal point of reductions for the previous administration, recognizing that in a post-Vietnam America there has been great reluctance to indulge in the kind of hyperactivity assistance programs that we had witnessed since the end of the Second World War?

"We're doing this first and foremost because it's our conviction in the Department of State that the overall effectiveness of the American foreign policy is intimately related to this nation's ability to manage its internal domestic economic affairs with discipline and with effectiveness. As one who sat abroad for 5 years and watched the growing malaise in our economy begin to influence the effectiveness of our international leadership—and I'm talking about such issues as runaway double-digit inflation, declining productivity, declining competitiveness of American goods abroad, and what was perceived to be by our foreign friends an inability to manage effectively our energy program. All had a severe impact on America's ability to influence vital national interests abroad, certainly were a contributory to the declining value of the U.S. dollar, and, in some instances, foreign nations perceived for one reason or another that we were literally managing some of these problems to result in placing the burden in energy and inflation on their shoulders.

"And so I consider that the American program and President Reagan's program to get our economy back on the track once again is not only of vital interest to domestic American interests, but it has a profound impact on America's effectiveness abroad." (Department of State Bulletin, April 1981, page 21)

Following his statement, Haig responded to questions posed by the assembled reporters. The complete text of Haig's remarks are ibid., pages 21–23.

Washington, February 28, 1981

SUBJECT

Former President Gerald Ford's World Trip, March 5–31, 1981

You have agreed to meet with former President Gerald Ford prior to his departure on his world trip.² He will be accompanied on the trip by Brent Scowcroft and Leonard Firestone, as well as the Chairman of the Board and President of Charter Oil Company. Although the trip is unofficial, President Ford is scheduled to meet heads of state of most of the countries he is visiting including Chancellor Schmidt, President Giscard d'Estaing and PM Suzuki, You should ask former President Ford to convey your personal best wishes to the heads of state with whom he meets.³ Countries he will visit include the Federal Republic of Germany, France, Ireland, Oman, United Arab Emirates, Qatar, Singapore, Indonesia, Hong Kong, People's Republic of China and Japan.

² On March 3, the President met with Ford in the Oval Office from 4 until 4:30 p.m. At 4:30 p.m. Haig and Scowcroft joined the meeting. From 5:10 until 5:15, the President and First Lady Nancy Reagan met with Ford and former First Lady Betty Ford. (Reagan Library, President's Daily Diary) No record of these meetings has been found. In his personal diary entry for March 3, the President wrote: "Jerry Ford came by. We had a good talk. He's very supportive of our ec. plan. Betty spent her time with Nancy. They are leaving on an 11 nation trip—business in 5 of them—the others pleasure. I gave him letters of greeting to heads of state in the countries where he's not on commercial business." (Brinkley, ed., The Reagan Diaries, vol. I, January 1981–October 1985, p. 22)

We have prepared briefing papers for former President Ford on the major bilateral issues involving the countries he will visit.⁴ You may wish to suggest that he raise the following important general themes of your Administration:

—We confront a series of crises in this dangerous and unstable world—in Afghanistan, Kampuchea, El Salvador, Iran, the Middle East and Southern Africa. The outlook is for continued instability in the years ahead, as developing nations seek to cope with their political and economic problems and the USSR continues to use its power to destabilize these countries.

—US-Soviet relations have fallen to the most dangerous level since the 1968 invasion of Czechoslovakia.⁵ A Soviet invasion in Poland would have devastating effects on East-West relations.

—The period of post-Vietnam malaise is over and the US intends to play a full role in the international arena. We have a number of strengths to bring to the task.

—Most important is the structure of alliances we have developed in the post-war period with the industrial democracies of Western Europe and Asia, as well as our important mutual security arrangements and political ties with countries around the world.

—We will work to manage our discrete alliances in Europe and Asia, our association with the People's Republic of China and our other security arrangements to reinforce one another in the competition with the Soviet Union.

—We want to deepen our cooperation with key regional groupings such as ASEAN.

—This essential core of associates provides the basis for sustaining a "new American internationalism" through the last part of the 20th century and providing a measure of stability in a rapidly changing world.

⁵See footnote 4, Document 8.

—We enter the 1980's dealing with a new generation of political leaders, in countries around the world, whose perceptions of the US have been formed by the recent years of American weakness, inconsistency, and domestic turmoil. We need to reach out to this new generation with policies and programs that are grounded in American values and responsive to their aspirations.

33. Editorial Note

On March 3, 1981, President Ronald Reagan took part in an interview with Columbia Broadcasting System (CBS) Evening News anchor Walter Cronkite. The interview took place in the Oval Office from 1:14 until 2:34 p.m. and was videotaped for broadcast on the CBS television network at 8 p.m. that evening. (Reagan Library, President's Daily Diary) Cronkite first addressed the U.S. commitment in El Salvador, asking if Reagan saw "any parallel in our committing advisers and military assistance to El Salvador and the early stages of our involvement in Vietnam."

The President responded: "No, Walter, I don't. I know that the parallel is being drawn by many people. But the difference is so profound. What we're actually doing is, at the request of a government in one of our neighboring countries, offering some help against the import or the export into the Western Hemisphere of terrorism, of disruption. And it isn't just El Salvador. That happens to be the target at the moment. Our problem is this whole hemisphere and keeping this sort of thing out.

"Now, we have sent briefing teams to Europe, down to our Latin American neighbors with what we've learned of the actual involvement of the Soviet Union, of Cuba, of the PLO, of, even Qadhafi in Libya, and others in the Communist bloc nations to bring about this terrorism down there.

"Now, you use the term 'military advisers.' You know, there's sort of a technicality there. You could say they are advisers in that they're training, but when it's used as 'adviser,' that means military men who go in and accompany the forces into combat, advise on strategy and tactics. We have no one of that kind. We're sending and have sent teams down there to train. They do not accompany them into combat. They train recruits in the garrison area. And as a matter of fact, we have such training teams in more than 30 countries today, and we've always done that—the officers of the military in friendly countries and in our neighboring countries have come to our service schools—West Point, Annapolis, and so forth. So, I don't see any parallel at all.

“And I think it is significant that the terrorists, the guerrilla activity in El Salvador was supposed to cause an uprising, that the government would fall because the people would join this aggressive force and support them. The people are totally against that and have not reacted in that way.”

Cronkite responded: “Well, that’s one of the questions that’s brought up about the wisdom of our policy right at the moment. Some Latin Americans feel that President Duarte has control of the situation. The people have not risen. This last offensive of the guerrillas did not work, and therefore aren’t we likely to exacerbate the situation by American presence there now, therefore sort of promoting a self-fulfilling prophecy by coming down there and getting the guerrillas and the people themselves upset about ‘big brother’ intervention, and therefore losing the game instead of winning it.”

Reagan said: “Well, no, and we realize that our southern friends down there do have memories of the ‘great colossus of the North’ and so forth—but no, his government has asked for this because of the need for training against terrorist and guerrilla activities, has asked for materiel such as helicopters and so forth that can be better at interdicting the supply lines where these illicit weapons are being brought in to the guerrillas, and this is what we’ve provided. And some of these teams that have been provided are also to help keep those machines in the air and on the water—patrol boats and so forth—to try to interdict the supply by water of weapons and ammunition. They need help in repair. They get laid up for repairs, and they don’t have the qualified technicians.”

Cronkite then asked: “What really philosophically is different from our going down to help a democratic government sustain itself against guerrilla activity promoted from the outside—Soviet and Cuban aid, as we believe it to be; your administration says it is—and Afghanistan? El Salvador is in our sort of geopolitical sphere of influence. Afghanistan, on the border of the Soviet Union, is certainly in their geopolitical sphere of influence. They went in with troops to support a Marxist government friendly to them. Why isn’t that a parallel situation?”

Reagan replied: “Well, I don’t think there can be a parallel there, because I was in Iran in ’78 when the first coup came about, and it was the Soviet Union that put their man as President of Afghanistan. And then their man didn’t work out to their satisfaction, so, they came in and got rid of him and brought another man that they’d been training in Moscow and put him in as their President. And then, with their armed forces, they are trying to subdue the people of Afghanistan who do not want this pro-Soviet government that has been installed by an outside force.

“The parallel would be that without actually using Soviet troops, in effect, the Soviets are, you might say, trying to do the same thing in El Salvador that they did in Afghanistan, but by using proxy troops through Cuba and guerrillas. And they had hoped for, as I said, an uprising of the people that would then give them some legitimacy in the government that would be installed—the Communist government—but the people didn't rise up. The people have evidenced their desire to have the government they have and not be ruled by these guerrillas."

Cronkite then moved to the issue of Cuban involvement: "Secretary of State Haig has said that we'll not have a Vietnam in El Salvador, because the United States will direct its action toward Cuba, which is the main source of the intervention, in his words. But Cuba is a client state of the Soviet Union. It's not likely to stand by and let us take direct action against Cuba, is it?"

Reagan responded: "Well, that term 'direct action,' there are a lot of things open—diplomacy, trade, a number of things—and Secretary Haig has explained his use of the term, the source with regard to Cuba means the intercepting and stopping of the supplies coming into these countries—the export from Cuba of those arms, the training of the guerrillas as they've done there. And I don't think in any way that he was suggesting an assault on Cuba."

Cronkite replied: "That intercepting and stopping means blockade. And isn't that an act of war?"

Reagan said: "Well, this depends. If you intercept them when they're landing at the other end or find them where they're in the locale such as, for example, Nicaragua, and informing Nicaragua that we're aware of the part that they have played in this, using diplomacy to see that a country decides they're not going to allow themselves to be used anymore. There's been a great showdown—we're watching it very carefully, Nicaragua—of the transfer of arms to El Salvador. This doesn't mean that they're not coming in from other guerrilla bases in other countries there."

Cronkite then asked: "You've said that we could extricate ourselves easily from El Salvador if that were required at any given point in this proceeding. I assume you mean at any given point. How could we possibly extricate ourselves? Even now, from this initial stage, how could we extricate ourselves without a severe loss of face?"

Reagan replied: "Well, I don't think we're planning on having to extricate ourselves from there. But the only thing that I could see that could have brought that about is if the guerrillas had been correct in their assessment and there had been the internal disturbance. Well, then it would be a case of we're there at the bequest of the present government. If that government is no longer there, we're not going there without an invitation. We're not forcing ourselves upon them, and you'd simply leave—and there aren't that many people to be extricated."

Cronkite concluded his questions about El Salvador by asking: "Even if the Duarte forces begin to lose with whatever military materiel assistance we give them, whatever training advisers we give them, are you pledging that we will not go in with fighting forces?"

Reagan answered: "I certainly don't see any likelihood of us going in with fighting forces. I do see our continued work in the field of diplomacy with neighboring countries that are interested in Central America and South America to bring this violence to a halt and to make sure that we do not just sit passively by and let this hemisphere be invaded by outside forces."

Cronkite then directed the interview toward U.S.-Soviet relations, commenting that the "hard line" administration position toward the Soviet Union was consistent with statements Reagan made during the 1980 presidential campaign. Cronkite continued, "But there are some who, while applauding that stance, feel that you might have overdone the rhetoric a little bit in laying into the Soviet leadership as being liars and thieves, et cetera."

Reagan replied: "Well, now, let's recap. I am aware that what I said received a great deal of news attention, and I can't criticize the news media for that. I said it. But the thing that seems to have been ignored—well, two things—one, I did not volunteer that statement. This was not a statement that I went in and called a press conference and said, 'Here, I want to say the following.' I was asked a question. And the question was, what did I think were Soviet aims? Where did I think the Soviet Union was going? And I had made it clear to them, I said, 'I don't have to offer my opinion. They have told us where they're going over and over again. They have told us that their goal is the Marxian philosophy of world revolution and a single, one-world Communist state and that they're dedicated to that.'

"And then I said we're naïve if we don't recognize in their performance of that, that they also have said that the only morality—remember their ideology is without God, without our idea of morality in the religious sense—their statement about morality is that nothing is immoral if it furthers their cause, which means they can resort to lying or stealing or cheating or even murder if it furthers their cause, and that is not immoral. Now, if we're going to deal with them, then we have to keep that in mind when we deal with them. And I've noticed that with their own statements about me and their attacks on me since I answered that question that way—it is the only statement I've made—they have never denied the truth of what I've said."

Cronkite then asked: "You don't think that name-calling, if you could call it that, makes it more difficult when you do finally, whenever that is, sit down across the table from Mr. Brezhnev and his cohorts?"

Reagan answered: "No, I've been interested to see that he has suggested having a summit meeting since I said that." (Public Papers: Reagan, 1981, pages 191–194)

After some additional discussion of issues in U.S.-Soviet relations, Cronkite devoted the remainder of the interview to posing questions relating to human rights, the administration's economic program, and Reagan's views of the presidency. The complete text of the President's interview with Cronkite is ibid., pages 191–202. Excerpts from the interview are also printed in the New York Times, March 4, 1981, page A22. Briefing materials for the interview, which Assistant to the President and Staff Director of the White House David Gergen sent to Reagan under cover of a March 2 memorandum are in the Reagan Library, David Gergen Files, Subject File, [Briefing Material for Cronkite].

In a personal diary entry for March 3, the President wrote: "During day I did a 1 hr. interview with Walter Cronkite—his last for CBS. He spent the 1st 20 min's. on El Salvador. He didn't throw any slow balls but the reaction was favorable. Because of our dinner we couldn't watch the show but I was treated to another W.H. service. They taped the program & played it back to us later in the evening." (Brinkley, ed., The Reagan Diaries, volume I, January 1981–October 1985, page 22)

In his memoir, Haig explained the genesis of the visit: "I made plans for an early journey to the Middle East to reassure our friends there that the United States would once again be a reliable partner in that troubled region and to set the stage for overdue progress in the Arab-Israeli peace process, which had largely lain dormant since Camp David." (Haig, Caveat, p. 89) will visit a first look at our integrated strategic approach to the security of the region. As you know, the Secretary strongly believes that the treatment of the Arab-Israeli issue or other regional disputes must be placed in the broader strategic context of the Soviet threat to the area. Without confidence on the part of these countries that we know what we are doing, we can hardly expect increased cooperation at any stop on the trip or after. There is, however, a problem in getting our message across.

The Secretary will undoubtedly be meeting with the leaders of these countries with only one or two other officials present on each side. That is the way serious business is done in the Middle East. Thus, while he will explain our strategic concept directly to Sadat, Hussein, Fahd, Saud, and Begin, there is a real danger that our critical message will not get much further in any of these governments, especially the Arab ones. For example, as Roy Atherton points out in paragraph 6 of the attached telegram, we cannot rely on the Secretary's strategic briefing being disseminated to senior officials in Egypt.³ There is also the problem that most of the American participants in the meetings will be foreign service officers rather than policy types.

This seems to us to argue that we three should accompany the Secretary on his trip and fan out at each stop to describe our strategy for the region to the senior officials who will, in fact, have a major say in the level of cooperation we eventually obtain. Such an intense set of subsidiary briefings at these four stops would ensure that we left behind us an understanding in the respective bureaucracies of how sharply American policy toward that part of the world has changed with the new Administration. In the absence of such comprehensive briefings, these officials central to our strategic objectives, will get an impression of what we are out to do either from fourth-hand reports from the Palace or from the pages of the Washington Post. And we will receive our impression of the problems involved in each of these countries from dry reporting cables rather than face-to-face encounters. Equally important, our talks with officials during the trip would provide us with important insights which would be of significant value as we formulate a sharper conception of an overall strategy for the region.

³ Attached but not printed, is telegram 5379 from Cairo, March 9. In it, Atherton, noting that Haig was invited to attend a dinner hosted by Mubarak, stated: "The Secretary should plan again to give an overview of the administration's approach to regional threats and our, and our friends', common response. (This should be pretty much a set piece to ensure that all senior GOE officials share a common perception of what we will be about in our Middle East strategy. We cannot rely on cross-briefings to get this basic picture across.)" An unknown hand placed two vertical lines in the right-hand margin next to the last two sentences.

Secretary's Meeting with Denis Healey, The UK Shadow Foreign Minister

PARTICIPANTS

Denis Healey

John E. Fretwell, Minister, British Embassy

Healey said European confidence in America had been shaken by the Carter Administration because of too much vacillation. The worry now is that the new Administration may emphasize too much a military approach. Therefore, Healey suggested the Administration should try to correct this unwarranted impression—and in so doing we would paradoxically help achieve the goal of enhancing Western defense.

The Secretary said it is not easy to walk the cat back. But America has a new President who came into office with a mandate to make changes and one of the changes is to restore the US/Soviet military balance. This will be helped by a restored Executive/Legislative consensus which wants this imbalance to be rectified.

The Secretary noted that he has participated in the past three weeks in extensive meetings with Allied leaders: French Foreign Minister Francois-Poncet;² Prime Minister Thatcher and Peter Carrington;³ German Foreign Secretary Genscher⁴ and with Prime Minister Trudeau

and Secretary MacGuigan.⁵ He came away from these meetings, concluding there is a strong consensus among these Allies for a somewhat more robust US policy towards the Soviet Union. In framing its relationship with the Soviet Union, the new Administration seeks to obtain from the Soviet Union an understanding for restraint in their global conduct.

In his talks with Western leaders, the Secretary said he reaffirmed the US commitment to pursue both tracks of the TNF decision.⁶ In this connection, we have announced a meeting of the SCG for the end of this month as a first step leading to a resumption of talks with the Soviets perhaps by the end of the year.⁷

The Secretary said the SALT process is a little more complex. The treaty was discredited by the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan and today there does not exist political or public support for ratification of the treaty. However, the new Administration believes in the overall SALT concept and is putting together a SALT package. At the same time, we have to have assurances from the Soviet Union that they will pull their horns in. Their international demeanor will have to change substantially. We will be talking about this "code of conduct" with Soviet Ambassador Dobrynin upon his return to Washington. It remains to be seen what the Soviet reaction will be but we have noted that they have been recently very moderate in their public statements.

Healey said the US will not find much European opposition in its efforts to restore the military balance or in adopting a more robust attitude in its bilateral relations. But the US will find concern that it is seen as tending to exaggerate the Soviet angle in local instabilities elsewhere. Many in Europe believe, for example, that the best way to get the Cubans out of Angola is to resolve the Namibian problem. The

Five-Power initiative on Namibia strengthened the Western position in Black Africa.⁸ There is a growing preception (and fear) that the new Administration may tilt towards South Africa. The US should find ways to give the Front Line States⁹ some excuse to avoid seeking UN sanctions in April. Perhaps sending a US Special Emissary to Southern Africa would be the short-term answer. The Secretary said we are considering such a proposal but we intend to proceed very carefully on Namibia.

The Secretary said he senses a new attitude in the Middle East desiring a consensus on security. The regimes in the area see the Soviet presence in South Yemen and in Afghanistan as a threat to their security. The Omani Foreign Minister¹⁰ recently told him that all of Oman's Gulf partners had privately urged them to keep a Western presence and to strengthen the American role in Oman even though they could not support them publicly.

Healey said he hopes that we appreciate that the European Middle East initiative is complementary to American efforts.

The Secretary urged Healey to fight for a moderate Labor Party. We have to have a stable two-party system in Britain. Healey thought the moderates had a good chance to pull the Labor Party back from the Left. But first the moderates must get control of the National Executive Committee.

Healey said the Spanish situation is worrying. Felipe Goncales, the Spanish Socialist Leader, told him last weekend there could be another coup in Spain and this time it might succeed. The Secretary said he shared Healey's concern and for that reason he was thinking of stopping off in Spain on his way to the Middle East.¹¹ We must all do everything we can to strengthen democratic forces in Spain.

Representatives from these governments, beginning in 1977, sought to assist Namibia in its transition to independence following its illegal occupation by the South African Government.

⁹ Originally an ad hoc caucus, the Front Line states were Angola, Botswana, Mozambique, Tanzania, and Zambia, the five countries bordering Zimbabwe and Namibia. Following the independence of Zimbabwe in 1980, the Organization of African Unity included it in this designation.

36. Memorandum From Secretary of State Haig to President Reagan¹

Washington, undated

SUBJECT

Immediate Critical Choices in Foreign Policy

The success and future viability of your Presidency will be determined by foreign policy decisions you must make in the next few weeks. We are, right now, faced with several challenges from the Soviets and their surrogates which cannot be ignored or wished away. We did not seek the confrontation but we cannot now shirk it. If we respond with strength, wisdom, and skill, we will have set the stage for a decade of stability and peace. If we fail to respond—or respond with weakness—the Reagan Presidency will be marked by the same deterioration of international stability and the resulting loss of domestic support that brought Richard Nixon, Jerry Ford, and Jimmy Carter to their knees.

In April of 1969 Richard Nixon faced the first test of his Presidency when North Korea shot down an unarmed EC-121 aircraft over international waters.² Henry Kissinger, whose own involvement in the U.S. response to that crisis prevents him from acknowledging the full magnitude of the disaster, nevertheless does say that:

I judge our conduct in the EC-121 crisis as weak, indecisive and disorganized—though it was much praised then. I believe we paid for it in many intangible ways, in demoralized friends and emboldened adversaries.³

My own judgment is even harsher than that. I believe that our failure to respond adequately to that clear provocation set the course of the Soviet Union and its proxies for the duration of the Nixon Administration, a course that was, in the final analysis, more damaging than Watergate. The timidity that we displayed at that time invited new provocations elsewhere, particularly in Vietnam, that we were forced to deal with from an increasing position of weakness. Having displayed our inability to confront the Soviets and their allies on the ground with anything more than the business-as-usual incrementalism which marked the McNamara approach to Vietnam, Nixon was forced to deal with the Soviet Union on highly unfavorable terms—including the signing of an unsatisfactory SALT treaty.⁴

³ The full quotation by Kissinger reads: “Overall, I judge our conduct in the EC-121 crisis as weak, indecisive, and disorganized—though it was much praised then. I believe we paid for it in many intangible ways, in demoralized friends and emboldened adversaries. Luckily, it happened early and on a relatively peripheral issue. And the lessons we learned benefited our handling of later crises.” (Kissinger, White House Years, p. 321)

The challenge today is more fundamental, and far broader. The world is waiting—friends and enemies alike—to see whether the United States will have the ability to confront the Soviets when there are costs involved. Great hopes have been placed on the new Administration, and on you personally, Mr. President, to reverse the retreat of the Free World in the face of the advances that the Soviet Union and its proxies have made over the last decade.

The Soviet invasion and continuing occupation of Afghanistan is the most flagrant and obvious manifestation of this move to encircle and divide its potential opponents, in the East as well as the West. However, Afghanistan was not the isolated episode that the Carter Administration sought to portray it as. It was a continuation of an historic trend of increasingly bold Soviet adventurism, continuing from the end of World War II through Vietnam and into the beginning of the Carter Presidency with the Ethiopian adventure.⁵ Carter's failure to respond to this, the first instance of Soviet combat advisers being dispatched overseas, set the course of his disastrous relations with the Soviet Union.

The Soviets not only continue to occupy Afghanistan, but the increasing challenges continue. During the transition to your Presidency we have seen an unprecedented intervention by Cuba and other Soviet proxies in our own hemisphere. And after your inauguration the Soviets broke new ground with the dispatch of advisers to Chad, not in support of the government in power but in support of a Libyan invasion of an innocent neighbor.⁶

Because the hopes for your Presidency are so great, the consequences will be even more momentous if we fail or if we permit ourselves to be bullied into a “business as usual” pattern of behavior. The world might believe that the weakness of the Carter Administration could be corrected with an election, and that possibility must also have instilled the Soviets with some caution. But if this Administration, with this electoral mandate, cannot restore the United States to a position of world leadership, there will be no more hope that someone else might do the job four years from now. The hopes of our friends will be dashed; the ambitions of our enemies will become boundless. And the world could unravel with a speed that would make the events of the last decade seem benign by comparison.

You must very soon decide how the United States will respond to Soviet-inspired proxy adventurism, whether it be in Chad, El Salvador, Angola, Ethiopia, or elsewhere.

The USSR

The common denominator in each case is the USSR; thus you must begin by insisting that all members of your Administration follow a course best calculated to send Moscow signals of our determination to resist its challenge. We are, clearly, not yet ready to decide how we proceed with the USSR over the longer term. Too much has yet to be studied and decided. Above all, relative military trends must be reversed. We still have a strategic edge over the Soviets; but it is an edge that, no matter what we do, will be eroded by the middle of the decade. Today we can still deal with the Russians with some confidence that their perception of our military advantages will lead them to fall back when confronted. We may not have that card in our deck by 1985.

In these circumstances we must not take steps now that will foreclose options or make achievement of your goals over the next several years more difficult. It would, for example, be a major tactical and strategic error to lift the grain embargo now.⁷ The embargo was certainly an inadequate response to the strategic challenge of Afghanistan, and the broader challenge of Soviet and proxy adventurism. But it was the only meaningful U.S. response. To withdraw it now—with no new and more serious response in place—would signify the end of U.S. censure of Soviet behavior in Afghanistan, might well invite increased pressure on Poland, and would raise serious doubts about the will of the United States to confront the Soviets when there are costs involved. It would bring the concept of linkage into doubt at the outset of your Administration, and thoroughly confuse our Allies, who might well respond by relaxing their already minimal trade restrictions against the USSR.

Facing up to the Soviet proxy challenge cannot be postponed to a time when we have thought through the broader question of our relations with the Soviets. Indeed, how we respond to this adventurism will determine the future course of our relations with Moscow.

⁷ See footnote 5, Document 4.

Cuba

The most obvious immediate issue you and your new Administration must face is how to respond to Cuban interventionism, most recently in El Salvador.⁸

We have been trying, through the interdepartmental process, to prepare for you a range of possible political and military responses to Cuban aggression. We have failed. So long as we leave it to the bureaucracy—no matter at what level—to recommend courses of action, we will get just what we now have: an insipid set of incremental steps that are, at one and the same time, too cautious and too dangerous. The modest steps suggested would demonstrate weakness and indecision, thereby sending our opponents a clear signal of our own weakness, while inviting an escalatory response. We, in turn, would then have to escalate, etc., etc. That is how we got into—and lost—Vietnam.

Cuba has been the Soviet instrument for intervention in Angola, Ethiopia, and now El Salvador. In every previous case we have chosen to object but not to act. This time, however, we have begun to counter-attack in El Salvador. That effort must continue, but we must carry the El Salvador battle to its source: Cuba. Nor should we restrict our response wholly to this Hemisphere (discussed below). And to do that we must be prepared to act decisively politically, economically, and militarily. We must be prepared to demonstrate to the Cubans and Soviets that we are deadly serious through the imposition of a series of calculated steps ranging from diplomatic initiatives with Latin American and European Governments (which will leak) through strengthening our land, sea, and air forces in the Southeast United States, to the imposition of a blockade if necessary, and, finally, to a willingness to use force to carry out the blockade if we must.

⁸ On February 17, Haig testified before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee that the Soviet Union, Cuba, Ethiopia, and Vietnam had supplied arms to the insurgents in El Salvador. (Bernard Gwertzman, "More Salvador Aid Backed in Congress: Key Legislators Voice Support for Increase After Haig Briefings," New York Times, February 18, 1981, pp. A1, A3) The Department of State, on February 19, provided select foreign embassies with a memorandum outlining collaboration between the insurgents and the various members of the Soviet bloc. (Juan deOnis, "U.S. Says Salvador is 'Textbook Case' of Communist Plot," New York Times, February 20, 1981, pp. A1, A5) The Department later released a public version in the form of a memorandum entitled "Communist Interference in El Salvador," on February 23. (Juan deOnis, "State Dept. Says Salvador Rebels Get Fewer Arms," New York Times, February 24, 1981, pp. A1, A9) The text of the report, also referenced as Special Report No. 80, is printed in Department of State Bulletin, March 1981, pp. 1–7. For Haig's description of the report and its reception, see Caveat, pp. 139–140.

Our objective ought to be to force Castro to foreswear intervention, whether in Central America or elsewhere, and to bring his troops home. I do not suggest that decisive action on our part would be cost-free. It would not. In the best of circumstances we would pay a price—temporary though it might be—in the Third World and initially with some of our Allies. And if our early threatening moves do not bring the desired results, then escalation must be inevitable, with all that would mean in terms of potential confrontation, allied concern, and domestic opposition.

But the cards are not all stacked against us. Cuba is an island off our shores, not a land-mass bordering on a neighbor ready to supply arms. It is engaged in propping up governments far from its own shores, against strong internal opposition. It is the Soviets and their proxies who have the supply and communications problem—and the political liability of suppressing internal opposition. And finally, it is the Soviet Union and Cuba who, when they see we are serious, will be put on the defensive, with the possibility that Moscow will tell Castro that he is on his own. And, should that happen, it is likely that Castro will blink before we have carried our threats very far.

Soviet flexibility right now is sharply limited because of the deep involvement in Afghanistan, events in Poland, an economy in deep and growing trouble, the continuing Chinese threat, and centrifugal pressures in Eastern Europe. Moscow will be hard pressed to respond with vigor. Dobrynin's recent remarks to me about Cuba suggest that the Soviets are prepared, within certain limits, to see us reply to Castro's provocations without becoming directly involved themselves. Thus, it is my belief that we have substantial room to maneuver against Cuba before the Soviets will feel forced to respond with much more than a propaganda campaign.

Libya

Qadhafi poses an equally real threat to the stability of the West. His intervention in the Chad, now augmented by Soviet advisers, presages a campaign of subversion in Northern Africa that poses another and related major challenge to vital Western interests. Here, too, we must act. But in this case, we have others who will act with us. The French, Sadat, and perhaps the British have had enough. Working with and through them, perhaps with the French and Egyptians in the lead, we can develop a scenario for reversing recent trends in and around Libya. Our objective would be to remove Qadhafi from power; our contribution to the common effort would be materiel support, but limited direct involvement.

There is an additional benefit, other than the obvious one, to acting against Qadhafi. It is already clear that there can be no solution, or substantial movement, for now to the Arab-Israeli problem; we are faced with some months of stalemate in the best of circumstances.

And we are also faced with a nervous Western Europe that will surely take steps before the year is out that will strengthen the international role of the PLO, thereby making Arafat all the more intractable. Action against Qadhafi would deflect preoccupation in the area with the Israeli issue, while strengthening Sadat, the Saudis, and Israel at the same time.

Conclusion

I propose, not a direct confrontation with Moscow, but a series of measures aimed at forcing Moscow's two most dangerous non-bloc proxies to cease and desist their incitement and support for revolution, whether it be in Central America, the Caribbean, Angola, Ethiopia, Chad or elsewhere. Cuba and Libya must be stopped now; if we delay today we will have to face them tomorrow, at far greater cost, and from a position of growing weakness.

But confrontation there might be, although I personally believe the Soviets will back off when confronted by a determined United States. If we are to show that determination we will have to act with skill on a range of issues including, but not limited to, Cuba and Libya. We will need an integrated program that includes support for Pakistan and the Afghan freedom fighters, makes effective use of the Egyptians, the French, the Israelis and others of like mind on Libya, and involves those in Latin America such as Argentina, Brazil, and Peru, who share our view on Cuba.

I would like to discuss with you the specific steps I have in mind. Thereafter, if you agree, I would ask that you instruct Cap Weinberger and Bill Casey to work with me in establishing several highly secret task forces to flesh out the details of operational political, economic, and military plans to implement the strategy I have described.

I would also like your authority to discuss with the French, and with President Sadat, the Israelis, and the Saudis, while on my Middle East trip, our thinking on Libya.⁹

In the meantime, I will be seeing Dobrynin soon, and will make it clear to him that whatever we do with regard to the challenges Moscow and Havana have imposed upon us will be a case of the punishment fitting the crime.¹⁰ Equally, I will emphasize that we have carrots as well as sticks available, and that Soviet moderation will be rewarded appropriately. But I will also make it clear that challenges by Soviet surrogates will be met in kind, that the USSR cannot escape responsibility for its indirect acts any more than for what it does directly, and that the course of U.S.-Soviet relations over the coming years will be determined by Moscow's conduct.

⁹ See footnote 2, Document 34.

That must be our strong and consistent message to Moscow and to those who do Moscow's bidding. But a message without acts is an empty gesture that but proves the weakness of will of the messenger. You, and your country, will be judged in the years to come by how you act now.

37. Editorial Note

On March 16, 1981, Secretary of State Alexander Haig took part in a television interview conducted by Ken Sparks for Great Decisions 1981, a program sponsored by the Foreign Policy Association. Interviewing Haig in Washington, Sparks asked him to define the foreign policy goals of the Reagan administration and contrast Reagan's policy with that of previous administrations. Haig responded: "Without trying to draw too many sharp distinctions, I think the dominating concern of this Administration is the recognition that the decade we have now entered is at once simultaneously the most dangerous and perhaps the most promising that free societies have faced, certainly since the Second World War. It is our belief that this is going to require a somewhat different approach to our foreign affairs problems. It means we're going to have to recoil from the post-Vietnam syndrome—as it's been referred to—and, once again, have our weight felt in the international community.

"We hope to do this in a very measured and modified way, recognizing that the post-World War II unique superiority that we Americans enjoyed is no longer ours. The basic themes will be as I stated in my recent testimony before the Foreign Relations Committee: a consistency in policy; not to veer day-to-day based on the pressures of momentary headlines, but a consistent set of themes which we will follow; reliability, so that traditionally friendly nations, those which share our values, can apply these values, although in distinctly different and unique ways in the context of their own self-determination; and, finally, most importantly of all, I think, is balance—to recognize that conduct of foreign affairs represents the careful, measured, sophisticated integration of political, economic, and security-related aspects of our conduct abroad. That must be part of an integrated mosaic."

Following discussion of various foreign policy topics, Sparks ended the interview by noting that Haig had spent his entire career

“working on foreign policy;” adding that many Americans were “disillusioned” by “the costly effects of helping our neighbors and our allies and containing our enemies.” He asked Haig if he had any advice to offer to “Americans who are concerned about what they should do about foreign policy.” Haig stated: “First, I think they’ve got to avoid being captured by contemporary sloganeering, whether it suggests excess hyper-American activity abroad or whether it suggests, as has been the case in the recent past, that we withdraw from there. The simple facts are that we Americans have an obligation to make sure that those values that you and I cherish are broadened and strengthened in the international community.

“And if we overlook illegal interventionisms, whether it be in Africa or Afghanistan or in our own front yard in this hemisphere, we’re leaving a legacy of increased risk-taking which could confront us as it did in the Second World War with the ultimate challenge to our vital interests. We must take these on, we must participate in the world community, which shares our values.” (Department of State Bulletin, June 1981, pages 23–26)

No drafting information appears on the memorandum. The meeting took place at the Department of State. A portion of the memorandum of conversation is printed in Foreign Relations, 1981–1988, vol. III, Soviet Union, January 1981–January 1983, Document 31.

The breakfast began with discussion of a Cabinet Council meeting concerning East/West trade. Secretary Haig said that he would not attend the meeting, because no detailed agenda had been circulated.

Secretary Haig then asked Weinberger if he had seen recent intelligence reports about the shipment of Soviet guns and tanks to Nicaragua.² Weinberger said that he wished the United States had the capability to blow up some of it. Secretary Haig agreed and, changing the subject, said that he was unhappy about the way Japanese auto import issues were being handled. He said that the two cabinet officials involved in the issue were doing too much talking with the press. Weinberger said that the problem, in part, stemmed from the new system of Cabinet Councils, which were being run by Ed Meese in the White House. Secretary Haig noted that nobody had elected Ed Meese and that he was not going to send anyone from the State Department to this morning's Council meeting.

Secretary Haig then said that there was an "NSC" meeting every day in the form of the President's security briefing. He said this was more than a briefing and that Allen, Meese, and Baker were using it to make policy. Secretary Haig said that he was going to have a "show-down" with the White House on lines of responsibility and over leaks which had come from the White House. Weinberger agreed that leaks were a problem and noted that in nearly every Evans/Novak article the third paragraph said what a "great guy" Dick Allen was.

Weinberger then asked what, if anything, the Administration should be telling the Russians. Secretary Haig said that it would be a mistake to talk with Dobrynin until the Administration had an action plan. Weinberger agreed, saying that Dobrynin was extremely clever and that he did not want to talk with him until the Administration had a policy.

Secretary Haig went further and said that the Administration needed a game plan for Cuba. Carlucci agreed that more work was necessary on Cuba. Haig asked whether the Administration was ready to do some "meaningful" things. Carlucci said there was little the Administration could do, because it possessed no economic leverage [less than 1 line not declassified], only military power. Haig agreed and added that a military response was probably necessary. Weinberger said that the Administration should consider a blockade of Cuba. Secretary Haig agreed, and said that the President had to consider this option. Carlucci added that the Administration's covert action capability [less than 1 line not declassified]. Secretary Haig then sketched out a scenario:

The Russians are distracted, he said, and the military balance in some respects was still favorable. He said that, if Reagan continued to conduct business as usual, the Administration would be “nibbled” to death. The President, he added, is going to be the “President or he isn’t.” Carlucci then asked whether Secretary Haig was suggesting a blockade of Cuba? Secretary Haig answered by saying that he wanted to consider a full range of actions, including air strikes. He said that in conversations with Dobrynin, he had concluded that the Russians were not prepared to defend Cuba against strong American action. Carlucci said that this sounded like an Soviet invitation to get tough with Cuba. Secretary Haig agreed and said the United States had to play “two balancing games”—dealing with Cuba and helping the Egyptians against Libya. Secretary Haig then said that Richard Pipes’s interview in the press had made the Administration’s task more difficult.³ It had created problems with General Zia in Pakistan and had also embarrassed FRG Foreign Minister Genscher.

Secretary Haig then said that he was going to raise this with the President, adding that either the President agreed to a disciplined system of decision-making or that he would retire to Connecticut.⁴ Carlucci then asked how Secretary Haig was going to approach Cuba, was he going to ask Bud McFarlane to produce a new paper?⁵ Secretary Haig said he would see the President and then get a small group working

³ Reference is to a Reuters interview in which an unnamed official, later revealed to be Pipes, claimed that war with the Soviet Union would prove inevitable if the Soviet leaders refused to discard communism. Pipes also criticized Genscher as prone to conceding various issues in the face of Soviet pressure. Both the White House and the Department of State issued statements disavowing Pipes’s comments, and Haig also sent a personal message to Genscher on March 19 noting his outrage and asserting that Pipes did not speak for the administration. ⁴ Haig met with the President in the Oval Office that afternoon from 5:13 until 5:40 p.m. (Reagan Library, President’s Daily Diary) A March 20 memorandum for the record provides a readout of the meeting: “In his effort to explain to the President the serious problems developing in foreign affairs management in this Administration, the Secretary had to raise the tone of his discussion. He said that the President seemed unaware of many of the difficulties but that he thought at the end of the meeting the President grasped how serious this was to the Secretary. The President agreed to see Secretary Haig every other day at a time to be arranged through Mr. Deaver. One specific point—the President expressed dismay at delays, reportedly at State, in getting ambassadors cleared.” (Library of Congress, Manuscript Division, Alexander Haig Papers, Department of State, Day File, Box CL 31, March 20, 1981) In his personal diary entry for March 19, Reagan indicated that Haig “told me he felt he was being undercut by other agencies etc. I worry that he has something of a complex about this. Anyway I’ve arranged that he & I meet privately 3× a week.” (Brinkley, ed., The Reagan Diaries, vol. I, January 1981–October 1985, p. 27)

The meeting ended with no decision on the timing for next week's session.

39. Statement by Secretary of State Haig Before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee¹

Washington, March 19, 1981

Security and Development Assistance

It is a great honor to appear before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee as Secretary of State. As members of this committee, you are aware that the conduct of foreign policy and exercise of influence requires many tools. It is the role and purpose of one of these tools—security and development assistance—that is the subject for discussion today.

Security and development assistance should be seen in the context of the international challenges that confront us and the foreign policy we have devised to overcome them. Today's world presents the United States with three prominent trends. First, power is diffused widely among many nations and some are prepared to use violence to advance their ends. Second, we and our allies are now more vulnerable to international unrest and violent change. Third and most dangerous, the growth of Soviet military power is now capable of supporting an imperial foreign policy.

The last trend is most alarming. Soviet adventurism in the Horn, in South Asia, in the Persian Gulf, and in Southwest Africa appears to conform to a basic and ominous objective: to strike at countries on or near the vital resource lines of the West.

¹Source: Department of State Bulletin, April 1981, pp. A–C. All brackets except those citing omitted material are in the original. In a March 19 memorandum to the President, Haig indicated that his testimony “concerned the foreign assistance budget, but the questions covered numerous foreign policy issues and El Salvador was not the center of attention. Nearly every Senator in the Committee was present and there was full media coverage. Senators Baker, Lugar, and Hayakawa were particularly helpful.” (Reagan Library, Executive Secretariat, NSC Agency File, Secretary Haig's Evening Report (03/03/81–03/25/81)) Haig provided a similar overview in his testimony before the House Foreign Affairs Committee on March 18. For his statement, see Foreign Assistance Legislation For Fiscal Year 1982 (Part 1), Hearings Before the Committee on Foreign Affairs, House of Representatives, Ninety-Seventh Congress, First Session, March 13, 18, 19, and 28, 1981 (Washington: Government Printing Office, 1981), pp. 152–157.

The depressed world economic condition is equally familiar to you. The spiraling cost of oil has been a punishing blow to all nations. It has been particularly crippling to the developing nations. It is estimated that developing countries paid $50 to $60 billion in 1980 for their oil imports. Adding to this burden is another $50 to $60 billion in trade deficits. All of this comes at a time when world population will increase by half in just the next 20 years—from 4.4 billion in 1979 to over 6.3 billion by the end of the century, with 90% of this increase in the poorest countries. Economic dislocations of this magnitude create conditions for violent disruptions, with dangerous political consequences.

U.S. Response

Our response to these challenges must incorporate several elements if we are to advance our international objectives. We require:

- A strong, prosperous, and productive American economy, because we can do little to help others if we are disabled ourselves;
- An American defense posture that restores the confidence and determination of friends and that deters adversaries from pursuing adventures; and
- The resources to protect our international security interests and to promote peace and prosperity abroad.

The President has proposed a far-reaching and dynamic program to restore the health of the American economy.² I fully support his proposals. The revised defense budget which the Congress will review in a short time is designed to revitalize our Armed Forces and rebuild our capacity to defend our vital interests.

² The President outlined his program for economic recovery in a February 18 address before a joint session of Congress, broadcast live on nationwide television and radio networks. For the text of the address, see Public Papers: Reagan, 1981, pp. 108–115. The President's February 18 message to Congress, which transmitted the proposed package on the economic recovery program, is ibid., p. 115. The White House report on the economic recovery program is also ibid., pp. 116–132. In his personal diary entry for February 18, the President wrote: "This was the big night—the speech to Cong. on our ec. plan. I've seen Presidents over the years enter the House chamber without ever thinking I would one day be doing it. The reception was more than I'd anticipated—most of it of course from one side of the aisle. Still it was a thrill and something I'll long remember." (Brinkley, ed., The Reagan Diaries, vol. I, January 1981–October 1985, p. 20) On March 10, the administration submitted the FY 1982 budget proposals to Congress. For the text of Reagan's message to Congress transmitting the budget, his message to Congress reporting budget rescissions and deferrals, and his letter to O'Neill transmitting proposed supplemental appropriations and amendments, see Public Papers: Reagan, 1981, pp. 221–223.

The third element, resources to promote our security and economic interests, is the reason for my appearance before this committee today. Before going into the details of the Administration's foreign assistance request, let me say a few words about the general directions of our economic policy and how we will shape assistance programs to complement these policies.

First, in the formulation of economic policy, in the allocation of our resources, in decisions on international economic issues, a major determinant will be the need to protect and advance our security.

Second, we shall continue to work with other countries to maintain an open and accessible international economic system. This will include efforts to engage the U.S. private sector more fully in the economic development process.

Third, the United States will not forsake its traditional assistance to the needy of this world: the undernourished, the sick, the desperate refugee.

Fourth, there will be neither abrupt nor radical redirection of our international economic policies. Where necessary, policy will be changed in an evolutionary fashion, with minimal disruption and uncertainty.

Fifth, the United States will not abandon institutions and agreements devoted to global economic and political stability. The United States will continue to bear a fair share of the cost to maintain and operate international organizations.

I have asked Jim Buckley [James L. Buckley, Under Secretary for Security Assistance, Science and Technology] to coordinate the allocations of all types of foreign assistance in which the Department is involved. Let me give you an example of what Jim undertook for me in recent days. We wanted to allocate additional assistance to El Salvador, and Jim worked with the various offices to put together the package of economic support funds, development assistance, PL 480, etc.³ I see this as entirely consistent with my responsibility, under the President, for overall supervision and direction of our foreign assistance effort.

Security Assistance

I referred a moment ago to the President's proposals for reconstituting America's defense capabilities. Our security assistance program

³ On March 24, the Department issued a statement on additional economic aid to El Salvador, which read, in part: "The Administration has approved proceeding with reprogramming of an additional $63.5 million in economic assistance to the Government of El Salvador for FY 1981. This assistance is urgently needed to help the government deal with the economic situation, especially to finance essential imports of food and of agricultural chemicals and industrial materials for the private sector." (Department of State Bulletin, May 1981, p. 72) goes hand-in-hand with this effort and must enjoy equal priority. This is because the friendly states we support can themselves help us assure our most vital national interests.

For example, many of our security assistance partners enjoy a geographic proximity to the resources our economy demands. Others possess timely knowledge of complex regional events and are best suited to understand these events and assure that they do not slip beyond responsible control. Finally, many of our partners have military forces trained and experienced in operating in different areas.

As we strengthen these states, we strengthen ourselves and, for the reasons just mentioned, we do so more effectively and at less cost. Friendly states can help to deter threats before they escalate into world-shaking crises. The issue is not whether a local state can singlehandedly resist a Soviet assault. Rather, it is whether it can make that assault more costly, more complicated, and, therefore, potentially less likely to occur.

In practical terms, this means that the air defense system we help a friendly state develop could one day serve as a prepositioned shield under which Western relief forces would move. We hope that day never comes, and all of our efforts are aimed at preventing it. However, in judging the economic value of these programs it is necessary to recognize the connection that frequently exists between today's assistance and tomorrow's needs.

In examining our overall security and defense needs, we have tried to balance the requirement for budgetary stringency with the need to revitalize our international position. From this review we concluded that our national interests demand a significant funding increase for our security assistance programs and at increased levels above fiscal year 1981. The President is requesting that the Congress approve $4.27 billion in budget authority to finance a total $6.87 billion security assistance program for FY 1982.

[Omitted here is information concerning the levels of proposed security and development assistance, in addition to information concerning multilateral development banks, international organizations and programs, and the Department of State budget.]

Conclusion

The program presented to you today represents our best judgment of the resources required to carry out our activities in these austere times. Cuts were made in the development assistance programs totaling over $1 billion, a 26% reduction from the previous budget—equaling if not exceeding reductions proposed for the domestic agencies.

For the past 2 years Congress has failed to enact a foreign aid appropriations bill. This has caused us substantial difficulties. We have been forced to neglect vital aspects of our assistance programs; U.S. foreign policy interests have been undermined. We should work together in the authorization and appropriation of these FY 1982 foreign aid requests to assure a U.S. partnership with the nations that strengthen our common economic and security interests.

40. Briefing Memorandum From the Director of the Bureau of Politico-Military Affairs (Burt) to Secretary of State Haig¹

Washington, March 20, 1981

SUBJECT

Your Middle East Trip/Approach to Regional Security²

Objectives

Your primary objective is to convey the seriousness of our concern about the threat to the region and our determination to move quickly to meet it, elicit local views on security needs, and explain (and gain support for) the evolving US strategic approach to the region.

Achieving US Objectives

Before addressing specific issues in Egypt, Israel, Jordan and Saudi Arabia, you will have the opportunity to make the following general points:

—We are putting together a coherent and integrated strategic approach to the security of the region.

—Although we have yet to reach firm conclusions, we are prepared to give a sense of our objectives, our determination and our enduring commitment.

—We need to build a capability sufficient to counter the threats to our mutual interests.

—This endeavor will require clarifying the roles which we and our friends, both within and outside the region, can and must play as well as the contributions each of us are able to make to this mutual effort.

² See footnote 2, Document 34.

—We, for our part, recognize our responsibility to take the lead, are prepared to do so, and will make a greater investment in the region's security.

These general points will form the foundation for a more detailed discussion of our concerns and requirements.

1. The US Strategic Context:

As you know, the US has traditionally tried to separate the problems of regional security and those of Middle East peace. To the extent a linkage was recognized, it was thought that progress toward Middle East peace could safeguard our larger interests, or at least that such progress was an essential prerequisite to implementing a coherent strategy to protect our interests in the region. Moreover, Israel, for regional political reasons, was considered a liability and not seen as an asset in countering Soviet or related threats in the Eastern Mediterranean and, in certain circumstances, in Southwest Asia. These perceptions are widely shared, particularly in the Arab world.³

There are strong arguments you can use selectively on behalf of a different approach:

—The Middle East should be seen as part of a larger political and strategic theater, the region bounded by Turkey, Pakistan, and the Horn of Africa.⁴ The entire region must be viewed as a strategic entity requiring comprehensive treatment to ensure a favorable balance of power.

—It is important, then, to handle the Arab-Israeli question and other regional disputes in a framework that recognizes and is responsive to the larger threat of Soviet expansionism.

—Improvements in the security of the region need not, indeed cannot, await progress in a peace process which will inevitably be slow and tortured. Although progress towards peace will buttress our larger security efforts, this alone cannot suffice. In addition, we believe there is a symbiotic relationship between progress in providing security to the region and progress in the peace process.⁵ Only when local states feel confident of US reliability and secure against Soviet threats will they be willing to take the necessary risks for peace.

—There are certain contingencies (particularly those involving the USSR) in which Israel has much to contribute and could play an important strategic role. (Clearly, this is a point to be made only in Israel.)⁶

³ Haig underlined this and the preceding sentence.

⁴ Haig wrote "1," "2," and "3" above "Turkey," "Pakistan," and "the Horn of Africa," respectively. He also circled the numerals.

⁵ Haig underlined the portion of this sentence beginning with the word "there" and ending with "process."

⁶ Immediately following this sentence, Haig wrote, "Amen!"

2. US Interests:

The above notwithstanding, US interests have not changed significantly and it is important that the leaders you meet understand this. We retain a fundamental interest in nurturing an environment in which local states are able to develop sound political and economic institutions and relationships. Several specific goals are necessary to further these interests:

- The demonstrated ability to counter the influence of the Soviets and their clients.

- The continued existence of a strong Israel.

- Continued Western access to the oil of the Persian Gulf in adequate quantities and at a reasonable price.

- Close relations with moderate states of the region.

- Ability to transit the region.

3. US Resolve in Meeting the Soviet Threat:

Threats have increased significantly in the wake of Iran's revolution, Afghanistan, and the accumulation of Soviet power:

- Regional states are experiencing the turbulence which accompanies the modernizing of traditional societies.

- There exists an environment of endemic conflict springing from political, religious, ethnic, ideological, personal and economic differences. Revolutions, external support of opposition groups, and "traditional" war are the rule rather than the exception.

- Most significant*, the Soviets, with the advantages of geographic proximity, and a large number of coercive instruments (rapidly available arms, advisors and proxies) have both exploited and created opportunities to further their interests.

Your journey offers an opportunity to communicate US resolve in meeting these threats. If we expect the local states to contribute to the stability of the region and to resist intimidation, we must restore their faith in our reliability. Making it clear that we are prepared to run risks and accept opposition is essential in this regard. Demonstrating our willingness to help economically and militarily will also be important. Beyond this, we must let them know we are prepared to fight in the region if our interests are threatened by the Soviets or someone else whom the locals are unable to resist. In this vein, it will be important to explain that we are exploring the possibility of increased (and indeed continuous) air and ground force presence and prepositioning in the region and that we recognize that we must be able to deploy more force more rapidly and sustain it more fully.

4. The Roles of Local States and Western Allies:

You will want to describe the roles we believe local states, the US and the Western Allies can play in a common approach to regional security.

—It will be important to convince your hosts we recognize they have essential contributions to make to regional security, we want them to be able to resist aggression and intimidation, and we stand ready to contribute to their stability with balanced development and security assistance programs.

—Your visit should help build their confidence that we are credible, capable, and ready to support them by providing arms for their use and introducing our own forces if necessary.⁷ In short, we are ready to demonstrate that it pays to be an American friend, and it may cost to be an American foe.

—In addition, many of the states, especially Turkey, Egypt, Israel, Saudi Arabia, Pakistan and Jordan, can (and must) play key roles in helping us to deter and counter Soviet pressures and threats in one or more of the following ways:

- providing assistance to others within the region;
- furnishing logistical support to our forces;
- allowing us to use their facilities for repositioning, stockpiling, operations, staging and transit;
- hindering Soviet access;
- assuming certain limited combat roles and missions;
- posing threats-in-being to the Soviets or their proxies.

—Some of your hosts may be reluctant to accept these roles. Your trip should be seen as our first opportunity to initiate a frank dialogue with several of these countries, to explain what their security will require, to explore their thoughts on how to deal with regional threats and to determine how willing they might be to cooperate with us. Our objective should be to persuade them not only of our concept of the threat but also of the need to contribute to a common endeavor to meet it.

[Omitted here is specific information regarding the countries Haig was scheduled to visit.]

In all cases, it will be important for you to make clear that our Western Allies share many of our interest, and that we believe we cannot—we should not—have to shoulder the entire responsibility for the area. You could explain we envision a variety of roles for our allies: enroute access, economic and security assistance, establishing strong political relationships in the region, military presence, rapid deployment capabilities, and assuming an increased share of the burdens in Europe and East Asia. The bottom line should be that the stakes, as well the threats, are great, and that all of us can must do more on behalf of our common security interests.

Administration. He said he was greatly pleased that the Foreign Minister had been able to make this visit and, given the reputation which had preceded the Foreign Minister, was certain that the talks would be productive. The Foreign Minister thanked the Secretary for receiving him at such a busy time. He said he had hoped to come earlier but the Diet discussion of the budget had precluded an earlier visit. He said the job of Secretary of State with the current Administration was a very serious burden. The close relationship with the US is the basis of Japanese foreign policy and he expressed the hope that these discussions, if successful, should contribute to mutual trust between the two countries.

The Secretary said that it was his personal conviction and that of the President and the whole Administration that the US relationship with Japan was the fundamental anchor of the US policy in Asia, the Pacific, and, indeed, the trilateral relationship between the US, Japan and Europe. It is essential we build on this relationship and improve it even further. Saying he would not go into great detail, the Secretary outlined briefly the approach of the new Administration. First, overall policy must be supported and strengthened by improving the military balance of the US with respect to the Soviet Union. This is the single exception in our budget in a period of austerity. Second, it is the Administration's intention to revise the kind of partnership we hold with our allies and others of like views and to strengthen these relationships. This would be done through true consultations—not just through provision of information—but consultations in the true sense of the word. This aspect is more urgent in a period when all are faced with shrinking natural resources, difficulties in access to energy, and a potential for trouble in the Third World.

The Secretary continued, noting it is clear the US cannot achieve its first two policy objectives unless we reverse our serious internal economic situation. President Reagan has announced a multi-faceted plan designed to seize control of runaway inflation. This has several aspects including tax relief, relief for the private sector, and relaxation of regulatory requirements. In addition, there will be efforts to control the monetary supply in a better manner. In the past, problems have been addressed by printing more money. This has not proved successful and we have been unable to maintain interest rates at an acceptable level. There are those who would call the present approach supply side economics, The Secretary said he called it sound economics.

The Secretary said there was a rather full agenda and suggested getting through as much of it as possible before the lunch so that discussion at that time could be more general and informal.³ The Foreign Minister said he agreed to proceed in that manner and suggested that discussions begin with the automobile problem, which was not conducive to good digestion.

Before going to lunch, the Secretary suggested that the East/West problem be discussed and the Foreign Minister agreed. The Secretary said the Minister may have detected a degree of robustness in our statements on East/West issues in the new Administration. We felt that for too long the US, and the West at large, had overlooked the propensity of the Soviet Union to intervene either directly or through proxies in Afghanistan, the Middle East, Southeast Asia, Africa, and recently in our own hemisphere. We would be less than frank if we didn't say the West had failed to counter earlier Soviet moves in Angola, Ethiopia, Kampuchea and the first moves in Afghanistan. This had misled the Soviet leadership which continued to intervene with little opposition in areas of importance to the West. Such intervention also subverted the aspirations of these countries to develop their own course, which is their right.

The Secretary stated that the US considers this Soviet activity to be a violation of the 1972 agreement⁴ and thus is counter to detente. We will remain dedicated to linkage in the full range of our relations with the Soviet Union: trade, credits, technology transfer, arms control, as well as in our recognition of the political legitimacy of a regime which was increasingly a model of Marxist-Leninist failure; not success, but failure.

The Secretary said that we are, in the case of Japan, grateful for the cooperation we have received since the Afghanistan invasion. We are as concerned as Japan over the growth of Soviet forces in the Northern Territories, their growing naval power in the Pacific, and the 30,000 Soviet troops in Mongolia. In this regard, the Secretary said he had taken the opportunity in a talk with former Prime Minister Fukuda last week to emphasize that Japan's sovereignty is best assured by the development of all aspects of nationhood.⁵ This is the way he had answered the question on Japan's defense role. He said he believed that international peace and stability were best assured by a West where all nations, including Japan, had their own organic defense capability. This will allow us to better manage and cope with the threat from the East.

A separate communiqué, which references the Basic Principles, was released at the conclusion of the May 1972 Moscow summit meeting and is printed in Department of State Bulletin, June 26, 1972, pp. 898-902.

⁵Haig met with Fukuda at the Department on March 19. Fukuda also met with the President on March 20. The memoranda of conversation are scheduled for publication in Foreign Relations, 1981-1988, vol. XXX, Japan; Korea, 1981-1984.

The Foreign Minister thanked the Secretary for his comments and said that a consistent and reliable US policy was an important factor not only for the US, but for the world. Without such consistency Japan would find the world a difficult place. Japan expects to see strong leadership by the US and an effective strengthening of the solidity of the Western world, with the US taking a lead. This is most important to world peace. Japan would also expect to take its place and play its role in the Western world and will develop its own defenses in keeping with the requirements and constraints upon such activity. The question is what does Japan do as a member of the Western world? In Japan's view the issue should be addressed not only in terms of defense but also through diplomatic activity and economic efforts, that is, a comprehensive approach.

The Foreign Minister said he wished to express his views on economic cooperation with the developing world. In Japan's policy great attention is placed on the North/South problem. If these problems are not solved, instability in the South can be used to advantage by the Soviet Union. It is important that the Western nations not take actions which drive these developing countries toward the Soviet Union. He said these comments were necessary because of recent journalistic speculation that the emphasis of the new US Administration was shifting from viewing the North/South problem as a totality toward a policy which makes distinction between friends of the US and others in the Third World. In this formulation, the US would place emphasis on helping the former rather than the latter. He said he did not know if this was true, but Japanese policy did not pick and choose between members of the Third World. It was Japanese policy to attempt to bridge the gap between the North and the South.

With respect to relations with the Soviet Union, The Foreign Minister said that relations were currently cool. In part this was due to the continued Soviet occupation of the Northern Territories, which Japan claimed as its territory, and indeed the Soviets had now deployed troops on those islands. Japan will continue to seek the return of this territory as it deals with the Soviet Union. Secondly, after Afghanistan, relations between Japan and the Soviet Union cooled to the extent that there were virtually no ministerial exchanges or any exchanges of very important visitors. Japan did not participate in the Olympics⁶ and has continued to be restrictive in granting new credits, viewing them on a case-by-case basis. In the area of technology transfer, Japan has abided by the conditions imposed by COCOM. The Foreign Minister told the Ambassador that there was no change in Japanese policy in regard to these two areas.

The Foreign Minister asked what the current US thinking was on the exchange of high-level visits with the Soviet Union and on large economic projects. He asked if the US would continue to maintain the grain embargo. He expressed concern that should the Soviets and the US find themselves in total confrontation, this could lead to a threat of nuclear war. All nations were concerned in such an event. Thus there was great interest in Japan over the question of arms control, and especially of the SALT talks. He asked what the Secretary's thoughts were on arms control discussions with the Soviet Union. Finally, he asked for the Secretary's views on the Brezhnev proposal for a Summit meeting contained in his speech to the Party Congress.⁷

At this point the meeting broke to reassemble at the luncheon table.

42. Briefing Memorandum From the Assistant Secretary of State for Public Affairs (Dyess) to Secretary of State Haig¹

Washington, March 25, 1981

SUBJECT

Print Media Commentary on "Inconsistencies" in U.S. Foreign Policy

SUMMARY. We have seen about sixteen news stories and columns, the earliest dated 2/12, alluding to alleged inconsistencies in foreign policy. The stories deal with diverse issues (Poland, foreign aid, neutron warhead, Chile, negotiations with the Soviets, El Salvador), but focus on this common set of concerns:

—A basic foreign policy framework (other than opposition to the Soviets) has yet to be formulated;

—Senior officials are making conflicting policy statements;
 —The administration is having to adjust its campaign rhetoric to foreign policy realities. END SUMMARY.

Lack of Foreign Policy Framework. Hedrick Smith, writing in the New York Times, contended that a succession of seemingly official statements followed by disavowals indicate: “the Reagan foreign policy team has still not worked out an overall policy framework or conceptualized the intellectual underpinnings of its daily action” (3/20).²

Proclamations Precede Policy. Daniel Southerland wrote in the Christian Science Monitor that administration officials, who promised a more forceful foreign policy, “are sometimes sounding forceful in public before reaching unified, carefully considered positions on the specifics” (2/12).³ Anthony Lewis wrote, “the line toward the Soviet Union has been a case of talk first, think later. Reagan and Haig began by calling the Communists liars and criminals. When Brezhnev suggested a summit meeting, they did not know how to reply” (New York Times, 3/15).⁴

Mixed Signals From the Administration. Roland Flamini, writing from Bonn in the Washington Star, said the West Germans viewed the neutron bomb story and the Richard Pipes interview⁵ as indicating an internal divergence of views within the administration. He claimed this dispute “is the main reason why a U.S. foreign policy has been slow in emerging” (Washington Star, 3/21). ABC’s Barrie Dunsmore suggested that U.S. foreign policy is shaping up slowly because of internal rivalry over power (Evening News, 3/22).

²Reference is to Hedrick Smith, “Discordant Voices: A Rash of Opposing Statements Bring Reagan Foreign Policies Into Question,” New York Times, March 20, 1981, p. A2. The full quotation reads: “Privately some Administration officials acknowledge that the Reagan foreign policy team has still not worked out an overall policy framework or conceptualized the intellectual underpinnings of its daily actions. ‘Aside from opposing the Soviets, we don’t really have a foreign policy,’ said one experienced diplomat. ‘All this is such a change that people are disoriented,’ said another career diplomat. ‘There’s a lot of confusion inside the Government.’”

³Reference is to Daniel Southerland, “Is there a ‘consistency gap’ in Reagan foreign policy?” Christian Science Monitor, February 12, 1981, p. 4. The full quotation reads: “The administration is having to adjust its tough-sounding campaign rhetoric to foreign policy realities. Its officials came in promising a more forceful foreign policy and they are sometimes sounding forceful in public before reaching unified, carefully considered positions on the specifics.”

⁴Reference is to Anthony Lewis, “Abroad at Home: Deifying The Vicar,” New York Times, March 15, 1981, p. E19. Lewis’s use of the word “Vicar” in the title is in reference to George Church’s article entitled, “Alexander Haig: The Vicar Takes Charge,” printed in the March 16 issue of TIME magazine. Church ostensibly based the title on Haig’s use of the word “vicar” to describe his role as Secretary, made during his January 28 news conference (see Document 23.) Lewis’s reference to Brezhnev is to Brezhnev’s February 23 address; see footnote 3, Document 30.

Campaign Promises and Foreign Policy Realities. Philip Geyelin wrote in the Washington Post, "Some part of the problem has to be that the administration's top figures hit the ground still running for President, so to speak . . . Meantime, there is one thing to be said for the Reagan vacillation: The second-thought zags have in every instance been an improvement over the zigs" (3/20).⁶ Daniel Southerland in the Christian Science Monitor: "The administration is having to adjust its tough-sounding campaign rhetoric to foreign policy rhetoric to foreign policy realities" (3/21).⁷

Western Allies Counsel Patience over U.S. "Zig-zags." In an article in the New York Times, datelined Paris, Richard Elder wrote: "Among the three major allies, at least, the inclination is to allow Washington the luxury of a certain incoherence in enunciating itself. For the present, these are taken less as signs of uncertainty or serious division than as a commendable process of cogitation before making difficult decisions" (3/23).⁸

An editorial in the London Sunday Telegraph commented: "The hand of Alexander Haig . . . is the hand of a pragmatist, seeking to achieve what is prudent and possible in a programme launched with much vague rhetoric. If he can succeed in establishing his authority and set up the same meeting of minds that Dr. Kissinger finally enjoyed with President Nixon, then American foreign policy can settle down on a coherent course" (3/22).

⁷ The date of the article referenced here is in error; this sentence appears in Southerland's February 12 article (see footnote 3, above).

⁸ Reference is to Richard Eder, "As U.S. Works Out Policies, Europe Waits Patiently," New York Times, March 23, 1981, p. A3. The full quotation reads: "Among the three major allies, at least, the inclination is to allow Washington both time and the luxury of a certain incoherence in enunciating itself. For the present, these are taken less as signs of uncertainty or serious division than as a commendable process of cogitation before making difficult decisions."

43. Memorandum of Conversation¹

Washington, April 16, 1981, 10:15–11 a.m.

SUBJECT

Vice President's Meeting with NATO SYG Luns: Alliance Issues

PARTICIPANTS

The Vice President
Secretary of State Alexander Haig
Secretary of Defense Caspar Weinberger
Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs Richard Allen
Assistant Secretary of State Designate for European Affairs Lawrence Eagleburger
United States Ambassador to the U.S. Mission to NATO Tapley Bennett Assistant to the Vice President for National Security Affairs Nancy Bearg Dyke
National Security Council Staff Member James Rentschler

Secretary-General of NATO Joseph Luns
Cabinet Director Paul van Campen
Special Assistant Elisabeth Borgman-Brouwer

The Vice President welcomed the Secretary-General and noted that the climate in which the Secretary-General's visit to the United States was taking place happened to be an exceptionally good one. The Vice President asserted that the United States has warm gratitude for the Secretary-General's leadership. The Vice President added that he knew that he spoke for both Al Haig and Dick Allen when he praised the constancy of the Secretary-General's leadership role and the great experience he brought to Alliance affairs. The Vice President emphasized that his comments were not gratuitous, were not "flowers," but reflected recognition of a simple fact: there is great admiration for the Secretary-General in this country, and he will find that there are few if any differences in the way we and he approach Alliance issues. (U)

Secretary-General Luns expressed thanks for the Vice President's words, and stated that even though they were too flattering, he liked them very much (laughter). The Secretary-General went on to assert that the U.S. decision to strengthen its forces had made a very favorable impression on all the Allies. The Secretary of State's previous role as SACEUR, with its very heavy responsibilities in both the military and political realm, is viewed today as an important asset in NATO's overall strength and the quality of American leadership. The Secretary-General said that General Rogers had built upon the Secretary's earlier effort to bring Greece back into the integrated NATO commands and to prevent conflict with Turkey. The Secretary-General went on to say that in the two important meetings which the Alliance will have in May—the NAC Ministerial and the DPC²—he is of the view that we will make good progress. The recent NPG had been a very good meeting, whose participants had found Secretary Weinberger's briefings to be both excellent and convincing.³ The Europeans, the Secretary-General continued, are always astounded by the amount of detailed information which U.S. intelligence is able to compile about the Soviets. The Secretary-General went on to refer to German Foreign Minister Genscher's recent visit to Moscow and Genscher's strong impression that Brezhnev does not want to intervene in Poland.⁴ (C)

The meeting took place in the Roosevelt Room at the White House. No drafting information appears on the memorandum, but presumably drafted by Rentschler. Allen sent the memorandum to Bush under a May 5 covering memorandum, in which he recommended that Bush approve the memorandum of conversation. A notation on the covering memorandum indicates that Bush approved the memorandum. (Ibid.) Luns was in Washington April 13–16 to meet with Reagan administration officials and members of Congress.

The Vice President asked if it were not true that the Soviets had been very reluctant to discuss Poland during that meeting.⁵ (S)

The Secretary-General responded that that was true, but that Genscher had no such reluctance himself. The Secretary-General went on to say that the Alliance hopes that the United States will go forward with arms talks with the Soviet Union. He explained that this would have a powerful effect on European public opinion. In that connection, he noted that there is an erroneous view prevalent in Europe, especially in the Federal Republic, that if arms control talks do not go forward, weapon deployments can't go forward. (S)

² The North Atlantic Council (NAC) ministerial meeting was scheduled to take place in Rome May 4–5, while the NATO Defense Planning Committee (DPC) meeting was scheduled to take place in Brussels in mid-May. ⁵ See R.W. Apple, Jr., "German Finds Soviet Silent About Poland: Refusal to Discuss Situation With Genscher Is Termed Ominous," New York Times, April 5, 1981, pp. 1, 5.

The Vice President asked the Secretary-General how he viewed current political trends in Europe: was there a mounting feeling, especially among leftists, that the United States is doing bad things or is the situation pretty much the same as it has always been? It is hard to read the tea leaves. (C)

In response, the Secretary-General said that there is a significant political problem in Germany. A sizable contingent of the SPD is now pushing for arms control. Willy Brandt has become more and more pacifist. As to whether leftist, anti-American feeling has grown or not, the European governments, though favorable to the U.S. point of view, are simply not very courageous. The Secretary-General asserted that Genscher was not wrong when he told him that European governments do not counteract, they only mumble. The Secretary-General said that he liked Dutch Prime Minister Van Agt, but he is among those guilty of that kind of performance. He has clung to power for four years by only two votes, which is no mean achievement; but he is not displaying leadership in the security area. (S)

The Vice President asked if Van Agt is likely to win.⁶ (U)

The Secretary-General replied that he has faith in the good judgment of the Lord, but sometimes the Lord is absent-minded (laughter). If Van Agt does not win, we will have to deal with his Socialist opponent who has had only one ambition for many years, which is to be Prime Minister, and who will do anything he can to get elected. (C)

The Vice President asked the Secretary-General to consider the worst-case scenario: do we have an unraveling of the Alliance? (C)

The Secretary-General replied that he did not yet think the situation was that bad. (C)

Secretary Weinberger noted that the Dutch Defense Minister, with whom he had recently met, foresees a more center-left orientation to the government with the coming May elections.⁷ (C)

Secretary-General Luns conceded that that is a good possibility but that he would not exclude the possibilities of a Christian Democrat victory. He noted that Prime Minister Van Agt retains considerable personal popularity, though this might not be sufficient to have a coat-tail effect so far as bringing his coalition back into power is concerned. (C)

⁷ Pieter de Geus, Dutch Defense Minister from August 25, 1980, until September 11, 1981.

The Vice President said that he sensed from the responses of his visitors that there was nothing imminent which was undermining the NATO Alliance. (C)

Mr. Van Campen agreed and noted that even in the event that somebody like Mitterrand were elected President in France, he would remain true to the Alliance.⁸ (C)

Secretary-General Luns observed that he could not say publicly what he can say in the privacy of his meeting with the Vice President, which was that military cooperation between the Alliance and France is in fact very good. In terms of historical experience, France is doing more in peacetime today than they have ever previously done so far as Allied cooperation is concerned, including their experience in the Little Entente⁹ or any other period of French history. Giscard's visit to Warsaw was not a success, not even internally, and the evidence is clear that cooperation between France and its Western Allies is better now than it has been for a long time. The Secretary-General suggested that the United States consider inviting Giscard to the United States. (C)

Secretary Haig stated that in his view the overall demeanor of our relations with France is far more constructive than he ever anticipated it would be. (C)

Secretary-General Luns noted that there is an extreme right-wing in French politics and that it says very scandalous things about the United States. (C)

Mr. Van Campen agreed and said that General Gallois¹⁰ is going around the world telling people that if there is no longer any will in Europe for defense, it is because the United States has deprived Europe of the means to defend itself. (C)

The Vice President asked for the Secretary-General's views on the situation regarding Spanish membership in NATO. (C)

The Secretary-General replied that Norway and Denmark are a bit of a problem in this regard because they are inclined to follow the lead of the Socialist Party in Spain, and to put all sorts of conditions on Spanish membership. (C)

Ambassador Bennett felt that, in the end, we will bring the Scandinavians around on this issue. (C)

⁸The French Presidential election was scheduled to take place on May 10. Mitterrand won the election.

⁹Reference is to the alliance formed amongst Czechoslovakia, Romania, and Yugoslavia in 1920 and 1921, which France supported.

¹⁰French politician and former Air Force Brigadier General Pierre Marie Gallois.

Secretary-General Luns noted the irony of a situation in which we tell the Spaniards they cannot place any conditions upon their membership while at the same time some members of the Alliance try to attach such conditions. This behavior contrasts with the situation in which the Federal Republic was admitted to Alliance membership. On that occasion, there were no conditions, either when it joined NATO or the European Community. Everyone else in the Alliance favors Spanish membership and only the Norwegians and the Danes are raising difficulties. Spain knows that it cannot bring the Gibraltar issue into the Alliance, nor will the Alliance agree to defend the Moroccan enclaves of Melilla and Ceuta. (C)

The Vice President said that he has detected a certain feeling in Europe to the effect that strengthening NATO increases its confrontational aspect.¹¹ (C)

The Secretary-General agreed that such a feeling exists in some areas and that it reflects the old “destabilization” argument, namely, that we should avoid building up our defenses because that would be “provocative” and increase feelings of instability. (C)

The Vice President asked if this attitude was on the increase. (U)

The Secretary-General responded that he did not think it was. Returning to the situation in Spain, he noted that we now had evidence that the coup attempt against Spanish democracy was much more serious than originally thought.¹² A good many of the generals had been wavering at the time of the coup. (C)

Secretary Weinberger asked the Secretary-General for clarification on that point. (U)

Mr. Van Campen interjected that only two or three generals had phoned King Juan Carlos to declare their loyalty; this meant that all the others were at least potentially ready to support the coup attempt. (S)

Secretary Haig noted that Juan Carlos is basically an optimistic fellow, but even he recognizes that he used up a good deal of capital in turning back the coup attempt and that he probably could not pull it off again. (C)

¹¹ An unknown hand wrote a question mark in the right-hand margin next to this sentence.

The Vice President turned to Mr. Allen and asked if he had any particular questions he wished to address to the Secretary-General. (U)

Mr. Allen replied that in his view, the mood of the American people was very much behind the President's rearmament program but there was no longer much public awareness of the American stake in NATO itself. This prompted him to wonder what might be done to get across information to our publics concerning the true value of NATO and what it has done to keep the peace for the last 30 years. (C)

At this point the meeting concluded to enable the Secretary-General to meet in a restricted session with the President in the mansion.¹³ (U)

¹³ The President and other administration officials met with Luns in the second floor residence at the White House from 11 until 11:38 a.m. Reagan was recovering from the assassination attempt on his life made on March 30. (Reagan Library, President's Daily Diary) In his personal diary entry for April 16, the President noted: "Met with Sec. Gen. of N.A.T.O. —Luns. He recalled our meeting with N.A.T.O. high command in 1972 Brussels. He confirms the new spirit of N.A.T.O. and believes we can get Spain involved by Sept. The So. Flank problem (Greece & Turkey) is coming along." (Brinkley, ed., The Reagan Diaries, vol. I, January 1981–October 1985, p. 31) In telegram 2672 from the Mission to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, April 23, the Mission reported that Luns briefed NAC members on his trip and "spoke in glowing terms of his meeting with President Reagan. Luns said that he had been accompanied to the President's private quarters in the White House by Vice President Bush, as well as by Secretary Haig and Secretary Weinberger, where he had met with the President for approximately 40 minutes. Luns expressed his admiration for the President's courage and physical resilience and stated that his reception by the President, as well as his warm reception by the most senior members of the USG, demonstrated the importance the US attaches to the Alliance." 44. Memorandum From the Under Secretary of Defense for Policy (Iklé) to Secretary of Defense Weinberger¹

Washington, April 21, 1981

SUBJECT

National Security Priorities—Memorandum for the President

The attached list was largely worked out between us and the State Department (Rick Burt),² and reflects in many ways DoD-suggested changes. I am not sure, though, it still serves a useful purpose now to send it forward.

The only item added without our agreement is the penultimate tick on page 2 about North-South economic issues. The diverse economic issues relating to countries in the Southern Hemisphere should not be lumped together under the old label of “North-South,” which presumes something like collective bargaining between us and all the less-developed countries. One of the mistakes of the Carter Administration was to accept this confrontation as given, and then look for ways in which the Capitalist northern countries could atone for the fact that their economies were more successful. (Obviously, the new State Department team does not have such an approach in mind, but we must guard against slipping back in the old mold).

Fred C. Ikle³

Iklé sent the memorandum to Weinberger under an April 22 covering memorandum, writing: “The attached list was largely worked out between us and the State Department (Rick Burt), and reflects in many ways DoD-suggested changes. By now, however, the list is somewhat obsolete. Frank and I agree it would not serve a useful purpose to forward this list at this time. Al Haig may advance reasons why the list should either be updated or sent as is. (Ibid.) An unknown hand wrote “OBE” in the top right-hand corner of the memorandum.

² Under an April 15 action memorandum, Burt and Wolfowitz sent Haig a copy of the memorandum, noting that they had been working with Defense officials on “generating a list of national security priorities,” adding: “Although you have a better sense than I do of whether it would be ‘politic’ to send this letter over to the White House at this particular time, I recommend that you and Cap sign the letter and that we begin to map out a strategy for getting these issues on the NSC agenda.” Burt and Wolfowitz recommended that Haig send the letter to Reagan; Haig initialed his approval. (Ibid.)

SUBJECT

National Security Priorities

We have been working closely together to plan our activities so that we can move ahead rapidly and efficiently to implement your foreign policy and national security program. We believe the following priorities should guide our Departments' work and the deliberations of the National Security Council (NSC) over the coming months.

—Our top priority is the Persian Gulf region. Our goal is for the NSC to decide on an overall program for improving our security posture in that volatile region. Closely related to this broad effort is the need to bring Pakistan, Turkey, Egypt and Israel more directly into our security planning in the region. A substantial security assistance package for each country will be an important element in determining our success with them. The question of a US role in the Sinai peacekeeping force (to be established under the Camp David accords) must be seen in this larger context. And preparations for oil emergencies must also be strengthened (in coordination with the DOE).

—A number of military issues affect the NATO Alliance. We need to develop better tactics to encourage greater Allied defense efforts and to manage the continuing difficulties in the implementation of NATO's decision to modernize theater nuclear forces.⁵ Similarly, we are reviewing US policy toward Japan, to maintain close relations and to secure increased Japanese defense contributions.

—The NSC needs to address your overall principles for our relations with the Soviet Union and to apply those to a series of specific issues: our continuing preparations to ward off (or respond to) a Soviet invasion of Poland, our preparations for initial steps in arms control, and our management of East/West trade.

—Central American Security issues pose a special problem for your Administration. We must continuously adjust and improve our policies to counter guerrilla activities in El Salvador and to interdict the Soviet and Cuban supported flow of arms. We need to strengthen governments in Costa Rica, Honduras, and other nations of Central America and we have to develop a policy designed to turn around the situation in Nicaragua.

—For Cuba we should develop a longer-term policy that will help curtail the Cuban intervention worldwide, (in Africa, as well as Central America). This policy has to combine judiciously selected military support for the forces opposing Cuban intervention with a program of political action.

—The Administration should develop a coherent policy to guide relations with China and Taiwan, and by strengthening US ties with China help counter Soviet influence.

—The far-flung activities of Libya against our interests require a strategy that must enlist the support of other African nations, as well as certain European powers. Libya's occupation of Chad presents both a challenge by and a vulnerability for Qadhafi.

—In addition, we will, in the near future, need to address questions relating to growing refugee problems and North-South economic issues.

—We believe that the issues underlined above would represent a good starting point in developing the agenda for the NSC during the coming months. There are, of course, a number of other subjects which we will be following and on which we will keep you apprised; but our expectation is that they can be resolved without NSC meetings.⁶ We will continue to work together to update our list of NSC priorities.

⁶ An unknown hand placed a brace in the right-hand margin next to a portion of this sentence and wrote something that is illegible.

45. Address by Secretary of State Haig¹

Washington, April 24, 1981

A New Direction in U.S. Foreign Policy

Some 100 days have elapsed since President Reagan's inauguration. In the field of foreign affairs, the first controversial steps have been taken. To paraphrase Mark Twain, these actions have pleased more than a few and astonished the rest. Although we have not remade the world, a new direction is evident.

We are acting to restore confidence in American leadership through a more robust defense of U.S. ideals and interests and a more realistic approach to the dangers and opportunities of the international situation. It is my purpose today to outline briefly the philosophy behind the new direction: this Administration's view of the realities of the world and the tasks before us.

A French statesman once remarked that the true business of government was to foresee problems and to administer appropriate remedies while time remained. In our approach to foreign affairs, we have sought to distinguish between the symptom of the problem and the problem itself, the crisis and its cause, the ebb and flow of daily events and the underlying trend. The problems that beset us are clearly symptomatic of deeper disorders, and it is to these fundamental movements of international politics that we must direct our remedies.

- Worldwide inflation, caused in part by astounding increases in the cost of oil, interrupts balanced economic growth essential to the aspirations of both developing and developed nations.

- Limited resources and political disturbance impede the eradication of hunger, poverty, disease, and other important humanitarian goals.

- Disruption from abroad threatens a more vulnerable West, as we draw energy and raw materials from regions in which the throes of rapid change and conflict prevail.

- Soviet military power grows relentlessly as Moscow shows an increasing readiness to use it both directly and by proxy and obstructs the achievement of a more just international order.

We must understand that these conditions are interrelated; they play upon each other; and the danger is, therefore, all the greater. If present trends are not arrested, the convergence of rising international disorder, greater Western vulnerability, and growing Soviet military power will undo the international codes of conduct that foster the peaceful resolution of disputes between nations. The symptoms of this breakdown – terrorism, subversion, and conquest – are already apparent. The ideals and safety of democratic societies are under assault.

Imaginative remedies might have prevented the current danger. Unfortunately, as these ominous developments gathered strength over the last decade, America's confidence in itself was shaken, and American leadership faltered. The United States seemed unable or unwilling to act when our strategic interests were threatened. We earned a reputation for “strategic passivity,” and that reputation still weighs heavily upon us and cannot be wished away by rhetoric. What we once took for granted abroad – confidence in the United States – must be reestablished through a steady accumulation of prudent and successful actions.

Before others can repose confidence in us, we must ourselves be confident. The Reagan foreign policy, therefore, begins with a justifiable pride in our country, its ideals, and in its achievements. Government by the people and a society under law are great principles to defend. Regard for individual liberty at home translates into a concern for human rights abroad.

Moreover, we are fully conscious of our historic role in the defense of freedom. Together with our allies, we have shared peace and prosperity. The United States continues to be the natural anchor for the free societies of the Atlantic and Pacific. Our objective remains simple and compelling: a world hospitable to our society and our ideals.

Confidence in ourselves—the crucial psychological element in any foreign policy—is evident throughout President Reagan’s program to restore confidence in American leadership abroad. Our actions are directed toward three projects:

First, to enlarge our capacity to influence events and to make more effective use of the full range of our moral, political, scientific, economic, and military resources in the pursuit of our interests;

Second, to convince our allies, friends, and adversaries—above all the Soviet Union—that America will act in a manner befitting our responsibilities as a trustee of freedom and peace; and Third, to offer hope and aid to the developing countries in their aspirations for a peaceful and prosperous future.

The President has established clear priorities in the pursuit of these projects. Understanding that American economic weakness would cripple our efforts abroad, he has proposed a revolutionary program to restore inflation-free economic growth. This program recognizes that America’s strength is measured not only in arms but also in the spirit of individual enterprise, the soundness of the dollar, and the proper role of government in a free society.

Fundamental to this approach is also the belief that economic recovery must be accompanied by a prompt correction of defects in our military posture. For too long, we have ignored this fact: The military strength required by the United States can be achieved only through sacrifice and consistent purpose. We have proposed a heavy investment in our Armed Forces to assure safety for ourselves and the generations to come.

Our economic and military programs have not lessened the need for balanced economic and security assistance abroad. This helps allies and friends to join us in contributing to the general security. It also adds to the flexible instruments of influence required for a successful foreign policy.

These efforts to strengthen America's economic and military capabilities provide the foundation for an American diplomacy that includes the following aims: restraining the Soviet Union; reinvigorating our alliances; strengthening our friends; and a more effective approach to the developing countries.

Restraining the Soviet Union

A major focus of American policy must be the Soviet Union, not because of ideological preoccupation but simply because Moscow is the greatest source of international insecurity today. Let us be plain about it: Soviet promotion of violence as the instrument of change constitutes the greatest danger to world peace.

The differences between the United States and the Soviet Union concern the very principles of international action. We believe in peaceful change, not the status quo. The peoples of the world seek peace, prosperity, and social justice. This is as desirable as it is inevitable. The United States could no more stand against such a quest than we could repudiate our own revolution. We were the first to proclaim that individual liberty, democracy, and the rule of law provided the best framework for the improvement of the human condition. And we have led the attempt since the Second World War to maintain two principles of international action: the peaceful resolution of disputes and the proscription of outside intervention in the affairs of sovereign nations.

In contrast, Soviet policy seeks to exploit aspirations for change in order to create conflict justifying the use of force and even invasion. Moscow continues to support terrorism and war by proxy.

There is an additional dimension to the danger. In regions sensitive to Western interests, in the littorals of critical sea passages, in areas that hardly affect Soviet security, you will find Moscow taking a keen interest in conflict. Thus, Western strategic interests, as well as the hopes for a more just international order, are at stake.

Our objective must be to restore the prospects for peaceful resolution of conflict. We can do this by demonstrating to the Soviet Union that aggressive and violent behavior will threaten Moscow's own interests. We can do this by demonstrating, as we are doing in El Salvador today, that a government bent on making necessary reforms will not be overthrown by armed intervention supported by Moscow or its surrogates. We can do this by never accepting the Soviet occupation of other countries, such as Afghanistan.

Only the United States has the pivotal strength to convince the Soviets—and their proxies—that violence will not advance their cause.

Only the United States has the power to persuade the Soviet leaders that improved relations with us serve Soviet as well as American interests. We have a right, indeed a duty, to insist that the Soviets support a peaceful international order, that they abide by treaties, and that they respect reciprocity. A more constructive Soviet behavior in these areas will surely provide the basis for a more productive East-West dialogue.

Reinvigorating Alliances

Another essential element in the restoration of our leadership is the strengthening of our alliances. From the outset of this Administration, we have placed a high priority on repairing the damage done to these alliances in recent years. Rebuilding alliance solidarity is a precondition for redressing the East-West military imbalance and for constraining Soviet international behavior.

Perhaps the most useful concept to govern these critical relationships is "consultation." Consultation should mean more than the formal act of soliciting opinions. It suggests what alliances really mean: shared interests, reliable performance, and sensitivity to each other's concerns.

We have acted to restore consultation as a useful instrument of alliance communication and solidarity. President Reagan's numerous meetings with heads of state and foreign ministers, as well as my own, have been marked by refreshing exchanges of views. A warm welcome awaits a United States willing to listen before it acts.

We are moving already beyond exchanges of views toward common strategic perceptions and concrete acts. We and our allies are taking common steps to restrain Soviet aggression and to restore our strength.

- On Poland, we have collectively sent a firm signal to the Soviet Union. The Soviets are now well aware that intervention would bring severe and lasting consequences. Indeed, the restraint we have seen offers some evidence of the benefits of alliance cohesion and resolve. Simultaneously, the West is working together to help the Polish people economically, so they can deal with their own problems.

- On theater nuclear forces, we and our allies have reaffirmed our commitment to modernization of NATO's theater nuclear capabilities based on NATO's so-called two-track decision of 1979.² We will also make a serious effort to pursue European theater nuclear arms control with the Soviets.

- In critical regions such as the Middle East and Southwest Asia, we have launched a new, intensive effort aimed at achieving common approaches to protect our vital interests and to help assure peace. At a meeting of allies interested in southern Africa earlier this week in London, we began to reach consensus on a realistic and fair approach to the important problem of Namibia.³

- On economic challenges, we are all experiencing slower growth and high inflation. Here again we understand that international cooperation is essential to solve each of our national problems. For example we have reaffirmed our belief in free trade as we consult with Japan to alleviate the plight of the auto industry in the United States.

Looking toward the NATO ministerial meeting early next month and the Ottawa economic summit in July,⁴ the most advanced nations in the world are coming together to meet the challenge from Soviet expansionism, regional instability, and economic interdependence.

Strengthening U.S. Friends

The reinvigoration of our alliances must be accompanied by the strengthening of our friends as well. This is particularly important in the Middle East and Southwest Asia, a region where violent action by the Soviet Union and its surrogates demands a more effective Western response.

The President's purpose in sending me recently to the area was to seek the wisdom of our friends on the issues of peace and security.⁵ But he also sent a message. The United States is fully cognizant of regional complexities and the necessity to proceed with the peace process. At the same time, we are determined to strengthen our friends and to work with them against the threat posed by the Soviet Union and its surrogates. These great projects must go forward together if we are to shake off our reputation for strategic passivity in the area and safeguard Western interests.

Fresh Approach to Developing Countries

Restraint of the Soviets, the reinvigoration of our alliances, and the strengthening of our friends are crucial aspects of the Reagan foreign policy. But the underlying tensions of international affairs go beyond the themes of allies and adversaries. A fresh American approach to the developing countries is essential if we are to treat the roots of international disorder.

The developing countries, sometimes grouped together as the Third World, are a vastly varied multitude of states, most of them beset by severe economic and political problems. What once united them—the memory of colonialism—is fading. The new emphasis is on the future, not the past.

The West in general and the United States in particular hold the key to that future. It is we who demonstrate by our own history how to combine freedom and development, political stability and economic progress. Two guidelines should govern our actions.

- We must show that friends of the United States benefit from our friendship, even in the face of Soviet-supported intervention.
- We must offer hope that the United States and its allies are not some form of closed club, hostile to the problems and frustrations attending development.

Our record on the issues of increasing concern to the future of the developing countries offers a sharp contrast to that of the East. We support economic development; the East does not. We assist the refugees; the East refuses relief. We offer the peaceful mediation of dispute; the East offers only arms of conflict. The developing countries are beginning to recognize where their best hopes lie, and it is in both the interests of humanity and our own national security that we promote such a trend.

In reviewing the causes of the Second World War and prospects for peace in the future, Winston Churchill concluded: “How absolute is the need of a broad path of international action pursued by many states in common across the years, irrespective of the ebb and flow of national politics.”⁶

As we enter the final decades of the 20th century, it is the task of the United States to lead the pursuit of this broad path, beckoning toward a more peaceful and prosperous international order. Knowledge of the obstacles before us will protect us against false optimism. Knowledge of ourselves will protect us against despair. Our difficulties will not disappear overnight. Yet we should not dwell too much on the troubles of the moment. The free nations of the Atlantic and the Pacific represent the greatest concentration of talent and wealth in world. We are a community of peoples devoted to human rights, democracy, and the rule of law.

⁶ Quote is from Winston Churchill, The Second World War, volume 1, The Gathering Storm (Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1948).

Our prospects are bright. Only constancy of purpose is required to preserve successfully the liberty that is the treasure of our civilization.

46. Editorial Note

Under Secretary of State for Political Affairs Walter Stoessel addressed the Los Angeles World Affairs Council on April 24, 1981. Stoessel began his remarks by emphasizing the “four basic elements” of the Ronald Reagan administration’s foreign policy and how U.S. efforts must be consistent, clear, and “focused within a framework which permits actions and policies in one region to be mutually reinforcing in another region.” After providing an overview of U.S. interests in Asia, Stoessel spoke specifically about Japan: “Our relationship with Japan is not only the cornerstone of our policy in Asia but one of the most close and vital relationships in our global alliance structure. As the relationship has matured, we have forged a productive partnership to deal with many of the most serious challenges of our times.

“As part of our security agreement with Tokyo, we maintain a credible deterrent force in East Asia. The Japanese have undertaken an increasingly larger contribution to the costs of maintaining these forces. Together, we have worked out guidelines for joint defense planning and continue to consult extensively on defense issues.

“Our economic ties are no less important. Bilateral trade between our two nations exceeded $51.5 billion in 1980. Japan is our largest market after Canada and our best customer for agricultural products, as more acreage in the United States is devoted to producing food for Japan than within Japan itself.

“No relationship, no matter how solid, is without some rough spots. Our large bilateral trade deficit and the auto import question are two economic issues which both countries will need to resolve. On the trade deficit, I might note that a positive trend has emerged, which will contribute to a more balanced relationship. So far in 1981, our exports to Japan have risen dramatically—46% since 1978—while our imports rose by only 8% during the same period.

“Our two nations are firmly linked as equal partners in a full spectrum of regional and global interests. We have welcomed the emergence of a more active Japanese foreign policy and Japanese initiatives in dealing with many different issues of global concern. In addition to its involvement in Asian and Pacific questions, Japan has demonstrated its willingness to play an active and constructive role in the Middle East, Africa, and Latin America. Japan has made a commitment to provide greater amounts of economic assistance to developing countries, accepting the responsibilities of the world's second largest economic power.

"We welcome and encourage a major Japanese role in world affairs. We will look to Japan to exercise leadership in dealing with the complex challenges confronting the international community. In this regard, we welcome the visit to our country in early May of Prime Minister Suzuki as a unique opportunity to take stock of our mutual interests and to devise common strategies." Stoessel also discussed U.S. relations with China, Taiwan, South Korea, and the Association of Southeast Asian Nations. 47. Memorandum From Secretary of State Haig to President Reagan¹

SUBJECT

The Atlantic Alliance

From the outset of your Administration, you have placed a high priority on repairing the damage done to the Atlantic Alliance in recent years. Rebuilding Alliance solidarity is a precondition for redressing the East-West military imbalance and for constraining Soviet international behavior. This is no easy task.

—On top of the legacy of weak and inconsistent Alliance leadership we inherited from the Carter Administration, there are deep—though I believe mistaken—apprehensions in Europe that we are on a collision course with an increasingly desperate Soviet Union, with Europe most likely to suffer from the collision.

It bears a typed notation that reads: "Direct by Special Courier to WH 11 am 4/29. jgm." VII, Western Europe, 1981–1984.

—Moreover, American and European politics are largely out of phase, with environmentalism, anti-nuclear sentiment, and a hunger for disarmament on the rise in many Allied countries.

We now have completed an initial round of consultations with key Allies and are heading into the NATO Ministerials,² your talks with Schmidt³ and your summit meeting in Ottawa.⁴ Despite the differences and doubts we have done well so far. But I am deeply concerned about a growing perception in Europe of U.S. inconsistency.

This is a good time to reflect on the reasons for the progress we have made to date and on the principles which should guide us in the future. Based on our experience of the past few months, three guidelines stand out in my mind.

First, the United States must lead.

Second, if we push too hard or are inconsistent, we risk a return to the disarray of recent years.

Third, our handling of a few key issues will be decisive in determining the future unity and purposefulness of the Alliance.

U.S. Leadership to Date

In response to our leadership, the Allies have been willing to speak out strongly on issues of real importance to us.

—They have continued to send a firm signal to the Soviets on Poland.

—They have reaffirmed their commitment to TNF modernization, based on the December 1979 two-track decision,⁵ and they have agreed to state that arms control is related to Soviet conduct.

—Schmidt gave the Soviets a strong warning in his state of the nation speech.⁶

—We expect the NATO Ministerial communique to present a firm stance vis-a-vis the Soviet Union.

³ Schmidt was scheduled to visit the United States May 20–23. Documentation on the visit is scheduled for publication in Foreign Relations, 1981–1988, vol. VII, Western Europe, 1981–1984.

None of this would have happened if the Allies had not sensed the new US determination to restore Western strength and resist Soviet expansionism. But it also would not have happened without your willingness to help our friends meet their own political needs and thus maintain support for NATO policies. For Giscard in particular this meant your willingness to move on CDE; for Schmidt and others it meant willingness to reaffirm our dual-track approach to TNF. These moves were important in themselves and in showing all the allies that we mean to work within their political boundaries even as we pursue our own more ambitious goals.

Realities of the European Situation

We must continue to base our leadership on a clear understanding of realities in Europe. Otherwise we risk losing momentum, and even returning to open disunity. We could be forced increasingly toward unilateralism in meeting the Soviet challenge, deprived of crucial Allied support.

The British remain our most reliable Ally, the French by far the most robust. However, both Mrs. Thatcher and Giscard are deeply concerned that we take into account the situation in the FRG. Mrs. Thatcher almost pleaded with me in London that we take care not to isolate Chancellor Schmidt, whom she described as “a really good friend of the U.S.”⁷ As I reported to you, they deeply fear the consequences of misunderstanding between a resurgent U.S. and an exposed FRG.

The realities of the German situation remain: the fact that Germany is a divided country makes the benefits of detente more tangible and politically sensitive than for any other Western country. The humanitarian content (visits between the FRG and GDR of divided families) of Ostpolitik is far more important than even the sizeable economic motives. Berlin is an especially sensitive pressure point. The FRG is very much on the front-line of NATO and is the key to its success. Left-wing pressure groups are growing more strident, and Schmidt is having trouble holding his party together.

Elements of the German situation are present throughout NATO. The Dutch, Belgians, Norwegians, Danes, Italians and others have large and important domestic constituencies devoted to improved relations with the Soviet Union. Most of them face serious economic difficulties. Even the British face resurgent peace movements, radicalization of the political left, and serious economic problems. Leaders in all of these countries must take these facts into account not only to maintain support for U.S. and Alliance policies but also to survive and to keep their parties from collapsing.

Key Issue

TNF has become the most immediate test case of our ability to manage this complex situation. If we fail to sustain support for the deployment of modern theater nuclear weapons we will lose far more than a much needed strengthening of our nuclear arsenal in Europe. We will suffer a fundamental political reverse from which the Atlantic Alliance would not recover for many years.

Schmidt reminded me in Bonn that it was he who first called for TNF modernization.⁸ He wanted me to assure you in the strongest possible terms that the FRG would stand firmly behind the decision to station Pershing and cruise missiles in Germany “no matter how much the far left might yell”. But he also made vividly clear that it would be impossible for him politically to stand behind modernization if the U.S. failed to pursue negotiations on limiting TNF deployments with the Soviets. I would add that the same is true with the other key deployment countries—the U.K., Italy and Belgium. None of the leaders realistically expect an early agreement. Schmidt told me the negotiations could go on “for six years”. All need the fact of negotiations to maintain popular support for deployment.

We need steadiness on this matter, with no US deviation from NATO’s two-track decision, and no hint that the US is placing conditions on further movement on TNF arms control. If the Soviets invade Poland, the Allies will agree that the basis for arms control, including on TNF, has been destroyed. Short of that, failure to resume talks with the Soviets will risk broad Allied demands that we suspend modernization until arms control is resumed. Once suspended, we would almost certainly not be able to get modernization back on track again.

Necessity for Consistency

Part of the European reluctance to follow U.S. leadership is the lack of credibility and consistency of previous Administrations. There are a number of recent storm warnings that there is renewed concern in Europe about this American tendency. Allies are worried that they might find themselves once again exposed as we zigzag between confrontation and accommodation.

—We cannot argue that TNF talks are out because the Soviets are still pressuring Poland, after we have lifted the partial grain embargo because the situation in Poland permitted us to do so.⁹

—We cannot ask the Europeans to accept missiles on their soil, if we remove land-based missiles from the United States.

Our key task is to build a political base with the Allies and to close the confidence gap. There must be a new premium on consultations and consistent political signals. This does not mean hypersensitivity to Allied concerns, which could paralyze our initiatives. It does mean that we take their needs and perspectives into account as we bring the Allies to accept our view of East-West relations and the increased defense efforts it entails.

After we have regained their confidence, then we will be in a better position to push for more from the Allies. To gain that confidence requires steadiness and patience. It's a several year task.

⁹On April 24, Reagan, in a prepared statement read by Speakes at a press briefing, announced that he was "lifting the U.S. limitation on additional agricultural sales to the Soviet Union," which he had pledged he would do during the 1980 Presidential campaign. The President indicated that he was able to take this action because the U.S. position was now clear: "we will react strongly to acts of aggression wherever they take place. There will never be a weakening of this resolve." (Public Papers: Reagan, 1981, p. 382) See also Congress and the Nation, vol. VI, 1981–1984, p. 495. 48. Address by Secretary of State Haig¹

Syracuse, New York, May 9, 1981

NATO and the Restoration of American Leadership

Graduation is a time for rejoicing. It should also be a time for introspection when we examine our directions in life, both as individuals and as a nation. This morning, with your indulgence, I would like to say a few words about America and where America is going, particularly our foreign policy. And I want to call your attention specifically to one of our most precious legacies—the Atlantic alliance.

Americans have been described as a people constantly in search of themselves. The vast number of schools and colleges, adult and home-education courses, tell a story of a relentless desire for self-improvement. We are not satisfied with the present. As President Reagan has described it so well, we are dreamers of a better future.

All of us know that in recent years, we have spent a great deal of time and effort examining our society with a critical eye. Observers from abroad described us as confused, lacking in confidence, and unsure of our purposes. The most fundamental questions were asked: Did our democratic institutions still work? Were they worth defending? Could we offer anything to the world? Was the dream over?

I believe this period of a perhaps excessive American introspection has come to an end. We are more certain of ourselves today than we have been for a long time. A profound national consensus has emerged. Our democratic institutions work. They are worth defending. Our ideals and our liberty do offer a notable example to a world desperately searching for peace and prosperity. The dream lives.

¹ Source: Department of State Bulletin, June 1981, pp. 11–12. Haig delivered the commencement address before the graduating class at Syracuse University. Under an April 25 action memorandum, Wolfowitz sent Haig “provisional outlines” for three speeches Haig was scheduled to deliver in May, including the one at Syracuse, writing: “We have attempted to develop the arguments behind the Administration’s new foreign policy directions and to force the debate as much as possible onto our terms (for example, by explaining how our policy is not simply ‘anti-Soviet’, but is the most realistic way to achieve peace and serve other positive goals.” (Department of State, Executive Secretariat, S/P Files, Memoranda and Correspondence from the Director of the Policy Planning Staff to the Secretary and Other Seventh Floor Principals: Lot 89D149, S/P Chrons PW 4/21–30/81) Wolfowitz sent Haig another outline of the Syracuse speech, as well as “a one-page statement of purpose and a one-page outline in brief,” under an April 28 action memorandum, stating: “I call to your attention the question of whether the introductory paradoxes might sound a little too academic. But I think that it is useful to score points by raising surprising and thoughtful questions, which will make your firm and positive answers seem the more striking.” (Ibid.)

This consensus, this reassertion of American self-confidence, is the very basis of the President's foreign policy. Our objectives are straightforward: We want a world hospitable to our society and ideals. And our objectives can be achieved if we restore American leadership.

Major Points in U.S. Approach

Let me give you a sense of our direction by discussing briefly four major points in our approach:

- First, our insistence on restraint and reciprocity in East-West relations;
- Second, our determination to strengthen our alliances, particularly the Atlantic alliance;
- Third, our intention to play a constructive role in the Third World; and
- Fourth, our firm resolve to strengthen our economy and our defenses.

Restraint of Soviet Union. An insistence on restraint and reciprocity in East-West relations is the central theme of our foreign policy. If we are seriously interested in a world where there can be peaceful change, where nations can settle disputes short of war, then we must act to restrain the Soviet Union. Soviet actions or the actions of Moscow's surrogates threaten Western strategic interests. Even more importantly, it is Soviet reliance on force and the threat of force to create and exploit disorder that undermines the prospect for world peace today.

Reinvigoration of Alliances. The next point must be to strengthen our alliances, especially the Atlantic alliance. The beginning of wisdom is to establish the consensus and confidence with our allies that has been missing in recent years. The key to this is genuine consultation, which has several elements. We must be good listeners; we must be frank with one another; we must work for the common good; and we should give each other the benefit of the doubt. Candor will serve the alliance well, but surely it will be more effective in quiet diplomacy than through the medium of public criticism.

Approach to Third World. The third point is our intention to play an active and constructive role in the Third World. It is important to do this for our own interests. Just as important, however, we should do our part for the well-being of the developing countries.

An American approach to the Third World clearly requires an acknowledgment of the problem presented by Soviet policy. But this acknowledgment must come on a foundation of understanding for the problems facing the developing countries. The West has a great deal to offer: economic and technical assistance, cooperation in the settlement of disputes, access to an international commercial and financial system. We have also shown through the example of our own societies that freedom and economic development are compatible.

The approach from the East is different. Moscow offers a poor model of economic achievement, and the Soviets disclaim any obligation to give financial assistance to the developing countries. Instead, the Soviet Union and its surrogates are heavily involved in stoking conflict with arms and troops. The names and places have become familiar to us over the past decade: the Cubans fighting in Africa, the Vietnamese conquering Kampuchea. More recently, we have seen the Soviets themselves invade Afghanistan and the Libyans seize Chad. And in our own hemisphere, there is incontrovertible evidence that Soviet arms are threatening an established government in El Salvador.²

We have no monopoly on wisdom in approaching this complex situation. Still, we must prevent the Soviets and their surrogates from destroying what the West and the developing countries can achieve together.

Strengthening U.S. Economy and Defenses. Finally, the fourth element in the President's approach is the restoration of the economic vitality and military strength of the United States. This is as crucial to foreign policy as it is to domestic purpose. Without a healthy American economy, we cannot strengthen our leadership abroad. Without an improved American military capability, we cannot restrain the Soviet Union.

Restraint of the Soviets, reinvigoration of our alliances, a new approach to the Third World, a healthier U.S. economy and a stronger military—these are the signals of our determination to restore our leadership in the world. It is going to be very difficult, and we cannot accomplish our objectives alone. In this age of interdependence, freedom and peace depend upon concerted action between the United States and its allies. Having just returned from a consultation with the NATO allies in Rome, I want to review briefly the prospects for a reinvigorated Atlantic alliance.³

³ Reference is to the NAC ministerial meeting in Rome, May 4–5; see footnote 2, Document 43. Haig departed Washington on May 1 and arrived in Rome on May 2. At a May 5 news conference, before departing for Brussels, Haig commented: "I think, in substantive terms, I would want to emphasize that the North Atlantic Council meeting just concluded, in the words of the Secretary General, was perhaps one of the most important that the alliance has held in the recent past. The most fundamental conclusion to be drawn from the deliberations that we have just concluded over the last day and a half was the reaffirmation, in the most conclusive terms, of the continuing unity and solidarity existing within the members of the alliance and, most importantly, in a trans-Atlantic context." (Department of State Bulletin, July 1981, p. 37)

Prospects for NATO

Finding fault with the Atlantic alliance has become a good-sized industry, giving employment to thousand of critics on both sides of the ocean. When we examine the assets of the Atlantic allies, however, a more promising picture emerges. We have the talent and the wealth among us to maintain a favorable balance of power with the Soviet Union. We can work together to restrain Soviet interventionism abroad. But we can do these things only if we think seriously about the alliance itself. We must remember why it was founded, what holds it together, and why it is crucial to the future—especially your future. An entire generation has grown up with NATO as much a fact of life as the electric light. You who do not know a world without NATO will soon take up the burdens of my generation.

NATO today presents two paradoxes. It is a military alliance uniting nations whose way of life and principles do not exalt the military virtues. It is a highly successful deterrent to war, yet its very success makes it easy to take NATO—and peace—for granted.

The alliance survives these paradoxes because the Atlantic family of nations is inspired by a common faith in the capacity of all men for self-government. No hereditary aristocracy, no religious orthodoxy, no master race, no privileged class, no gang of terrorists has a right to rule a people by force. As free peoples, we obey the laws passed by governments we have freely chosen. Our military forces take orders from elected civilian authority. Our young people enjoy freedom of thought, able to question even the worth of their own societies. These deeply held principles lead us to oppose aggression, tyranny, and terrorism.

A clear contrast exists between NATO and the Soviet-dominated Warsaw Pact. NATO is a voluntary defensive alliance pledged to strengthen free institutions and designed to deter aggression. The Warsaw Pact's armed forces have been used principally to deprive their own peoples of the right of self-government.

A similar contrast between the values of NATO and the values of the Soviet Union may be seen on East-West exchanges. The Soviets are anxious to import Western credit, Western technology, Western consumer goods and machinery, and Western food to save their system from its economic failures. The most controlled Soviet export, however, is human talent, those who wish to vote with their feet for opportunity in the West.

In fact, the Soviet system is showing signs of spiritual exhaustion. We are proud of our artists, scientists, and social critics; theirs are censored, exiled, sent on false pretenses to mental institutions, or condemned to forced labor. We are proud of the life of the mind to which Syracuse University is a living monument. The Soviets are afraid of the intellectual and spiritual life of their peoples.

The commitment of the allied countries to peace and freedom inspires not only our common response to the crisis in Poland but also our work in the Conference on Security and Cooperation (the Helsinki accords) in Europe on behalf of individual rights and contact between peoples.⁴ The Atlantic nations constitute an enduring natural community with many cultural, economic, and organizational links beside NATO itself. NATO lives because it is rooted in the ideals of this community. The alliance speaks to our deeply cherished beliefs.

Do we still need the Atlantic alliance? Secretary of State Dean Acheson explained the need for NATO to the American people in 1949 by saying that it was “the statement of the facts and lessons of history.”⁵ Two world wars had shown that aggression aimed at the domination of Europe threatened the survival of the United States and inevitably involved us in war. Out of this bitter experience, we abandoned our historic policy of aloofness from European alliances. Our participation in NATO remains essential to the task of keeping the peace in Europe.

Allied strength and unity, not lack of Soviet ambition, have protected us. And allied weakness or disunity may tempt the Soviets. Indeed, we face today perhaps a more complicated challenge than was contemplated by the founders of NATO. The Soviet Union today is a power with a global military reach. Soviet forces are stronger than our own in some categories. And Soviet surrogates in Africa, Asia, and Central America, have been exploiting conflicts to the detriment of both the local peoples and Western strategic interests.

We should not exaggerate the strength of our adversary. Moscow faces an unenviable present and a gloomy future. A list of formidable problems confronts it, ranging from the hostility of China to the difficult Polish situation, from economic failures to ideological sterility. But these weaknesses should not make us too comfortable. A state as powerful and ambitious as the Soviet Union may be more dangerous because its weaknesses run to the heart of its system. That is why the

In it, Acheson asserted: “It is clear that the North Atlantic pact is not an improvisation. It is the statement of the facts and lessons of history. We have learned our history lesson from two world wars in less than half a century. That experience has taught us that the control of Europe by a single aggressive, unfriendly power would constitute an intolerable threat to the national security of the United States.” (Department of State Bulletin, March 27, 1949, p. 385) The full text address is ibid., pp. 384–388.

first task of American leadership and the Atlantic alliance is to establish new restraints on Soviet behavior.

Recent Progress

Let me conclude by reporting to you on the recent progress we have made toward strengthening the alliance. At a meeting of NATO's North Atlantic Council earlier this week in Rome, we reaffirmed alliance solidarity and our belief in the values of Western democracy. In formal sessions and a host of informal meetings, the NATO governments freely achieved a consensus in order to bolster the common defense. Our approach reflected a very realistic Western attitude toward the problems of arms modernization and arms control. In announcing that negotiations with the Soviet Union on limiting theater nuclear weapons could commence by the end of the year, we and our allies demonstrated that free peoples were not afraid to talk with an adversary.⁶ In agreeing, at the same time, that NATO would modernize its defenses, the alliance also showed that negotiations must be supported by a sound military posture.

This is only the beginning, of course, but already a change for the better can be detected in the spirit of our cooperation. Clearly our allies welcome a more robust American leadership, informed by a more sensitive appreciation of their problems.

Today is also a beginning for you. You have heard me patiently—perhaps not so patiently—talk about ideals and identity, leadership and alliance, danger and opportunity. Your future is in your own hands. But the intangibles of Western civilization, the inner strengths, the real intellectual and spiritual treasures of free men are also in your hands. Cherish those things and cherish the instrument of their protection, the Atlantic alliance. Perhaps Benjamin Disraeli captured the moment of your graduation best when he wrote that “the youth of the nation are the trustees of posterity.”⁷ It is my privilege today to wish you the very best as you commence your trusteeship.

On May 17, 1981, President Ronald Reagan delivered the commencement address at the University of Notre Dame in South Bend, Indiana. Prior to the address Father Theodore Hesburgh, Notre Dame's President, conferred an honorary doctor of laws degree upon the President. Speaking at 3:11 p.m., Reagan began his address by referencing one of his most famous motion picture roles, that of Notre Dame football player George Gipp in Knute Rockne—All American, noting that actor Pat O'Brien, who had played former Notre Dame football coach Rockne, was also in attendance at the ceremony. In the course of the address, the President predicted an end to communism: "The years ahead are great ones for this country, for the cause of freedom and the spread of civilization. The West won't contain communism, it will transcend communism. It won't bother to dismiss or denounce it, it will dismiss it as some bizarre chapter in human history whose last pages are even now being written." (Public Papers: Reagan, 1981, page 434) The complete text of the President's address is ibid., pages 431–435.

In his personal diary entry for May 17, the President wrote: "Father Hesburgh met us at the airport and we drove to Notre Dame. It was commencement for 2000 graduates but there must have been 15,000 all told in the auditorium. Pat O'Brien was there also to get an honorary degree. It really was exciting. Every N.D. student sees the Rockne film and so the greeting for Pat & me was overwhelming. Speech went O.K. and I was made an honorary member of the Monogram Club. When I opened my certificate I thought they'd made 2 copies—they hadn't, the 2nd was to 'The Gipper.' He died before graduation so had never been made a member." (Brinkley, ed., The Reagan Diaries, volume I, January 1981–October 1985, page 40)

During the President's June 16 news conference, United Press International (UPI) reporter Dean Reynolds, referencing the Notre Dame address, asked the President if recent events "in Poland constitute the beginning of the end of Soviet domination of Eastern Europe." The President responded: "Well, what I meant then in my remarks at Notre Dame and what I believe now about what we're seeing tie together. I just think that it is impossible—and history reveals this—for any form of government to completely deny freedom to people and have that go on interminably. There eventually comes an end to it. And I think the things we're seeing, not only in Poland but the reports that are beginning to come out of Russia itself about the younger generation and its resistance to long-time government controls, is an indication that communism is an aberration. It's not a normal way of living for human beings, and I think we are seeing the first, beginning cracks, the beginning of the end."

Later in the news conference, when asked if he would provide an outline of his administration's overall foreign policy, as he had yet "to make a major foreign policy address," the President commented: "Well, there seems to be a feeling as if an address on foreign policy is somehow evidence that you have a foreign policy, and until you make an address, you don't have one. And I challenge that. I'm satisfied that we do have a foreign policy.

"I have met with eight heads of state already, representatives of nine other nations. The Secretary of State is making his second trip and is now in China and is going to meet with the ASEAN nations in the Philippines and then go on for a meeting in New Zealand. The Deputy Secretary of State has been in Africa and is now returning by way of Europe. I have been in personal communication by mail with President Brezhnev.

"I don't necessarily believe that you must, to have a foreign policy, stand up and make a wide declaration that this is your foreign policy. I've spoken about a number of areas. We are going forward with a program, a tripartite program, dealing with Central America and the Caribbean. We have tried to deal with various areas of the world—both Asia, Africa, and in Europe. And so as to an address, I definitely did not do one at commencements, because I happen to believe, as I said at Notre Dame, that it has been traditional for people in my position to go and use a graduation ceremony as a forum for making an address that was of no interest particularly or no connection to the occasion, but just for wide dissemination. And I thought that the young people who were graduating deserved a speech, whether good or bad, that was aimed at them." (Public Papers: Reagan, 1981, pages 519–520, 520–521)

50. Editorial Note

On May 29, 1981, in remarks made at the St. Louis, Missouri, Town Hall Forum, sponsored by the St. Louis Regional Commerce and Growth Association, Secretary of State Alexander Haig outlined the objectives established by the Ronald Reagan administration in pursuit of its foreign policy. Haig had referenced some of these objectives during his April 24 address before the American Society of Newspaper Editors (see Document 45) and he expanded upon them to the St. Louis audience: "The essence of President Reagan's foreign policy is a policy which some describe as being less than clear at the moment. I will accept the charge that we have not set out some grand design, some conceptual framework which from day-to-day provides a scorecard for contemporary critics.

“We have, however, established a fundamental bedrock of national objectives, and that is to recreate a world structure hospitable to the values and ideals of the American people—the freedom and dignity of the individual—and to recognize that necessary and desirable historic change must occur through the accepted rules of international law and the mores of Western civilization rather than through bloodshed, terrorism, and resort to so-called wars of national liberation.

“These objectives are structured over what I call ‘four pillars,’ the first pillar of which is the attempt to establish a relationship with the Soviet Union built on restraint and reciprocity and a clear recognition that such a goal and such a pillar cannot be structured until the United States reverses the worsening trends in military balances between East and West.

“Secondly, we have recognized the imperative of refurbishing traditional alliances and bilateral relationships with those nations in the world which share our values. This can only be done with a new spirit of consultation, built on reliability in the American approach to our relationships with our friends abroad, built on a recognition of traditional friendships, and a need for consistency in manifesting our recognition of those friendships.

“Thirdly, to recognize that we have to construct in this changing world a just and responsible relationship with the developing world and to do so with full cognizance that there are changing attitudes in this developing world today. Increasingly, developing leaders in black Africa, this hemisphere, and in Asia are recognizing that a close alignment with Marxist-Leninism in the Soviet model brings with it bayonets and bullets, pervasive presence, and frequently a client-state relationship. Whereas relationships with the Western industrialized world bring economic growth, development, technology, medicine, human development, and participation in a world market community where performance and work dictate rewards.

“And, finally, this new foreign policy structured by President Reagan recognizes first and foremost that America cannot once again lead abroad until it cleans up its own economic situation here at home.

“I’ve witnessed the American dollar decline in value over an extended period in Europe and with it American prestige and influence. And the impact of ill-disciplined, runaway double-digit inflation here at home on foreign perceptions of America’s ability to carry out its international tasks is sometimes staggering.

“So all of these things together represent what I call a four-tiered structure to achieve these objectives I touched upon.

“Where do we stand in the task? The jury, of course, is still out. But I think it’s a remarkable period in American history, one unique in my 20 years of public service at a relatively high level, where I see a remarkable consensus of the American people, the American Congress, and the American executive branch to roll up our sleeves and to put America back in action again.

“It’s a source of great comfort and pride to me. It’s also a source of certain caution that those of us in Washington who today carry out your tasks have a great responsibility not to abuse this wonderful consensus that has been so hard fought and so long in coming. I’m optimistic that will not happen.” (Department of State Bulletin, July 1981, page 13)

51. Memorandum From Carnes Lord of the National Security Council Staff to the President’s Assistant for National Security Affairs (Allen)¹

Washington, June 8, 1981

SUBJECT

Education for National Security (U)

It is not too soon to begin thinking about a problem which goes to the heart of many of the difficulties we face in the national security area: the ignorance and misinformation on this subject so common even (indeed, especially) among our best educated, and the steady deterioration in the availability and quality of training in a variety of fields essential to the effective implementation of national security policy. I offer some preliminary analysis in the hope of stimulating thought on how best to pursue this difficult and politically sensitive issue.

At the root of the problem is the marginal role of war and strategy in American political culture. Ours is a commercial society which relegates military affairs to the periphery of its consciousness, and which looks on politics as an arena of peaceful competition where the adjudication of conflicting interests is decided by bargaining and the application of highly developed legal rules. In the Soviet Union, by contrast, politics is merely an extension of armed struggle, and is governed by highly developed strategic/tactical concepts incorporating military, economic, psychological and ideological factors.

We are thus at a substantial disadvantage from the very beginning in our dealings with the Soviets. But this margin has been greatly widened in the course of the last fifteen years by the outburst of anti-military sentiment connected with the Vietnam War and the hardening of this sentiment into a powerful stratum of opinion which continues dominant (as the reaction to El Salvador should be sufficient to show) in the elite universities and media, and through them, in educated opinion in the country as a whole. This development—which must not be underestimated in spite of recent evidence of greater public receptivity to increased defense spending—has done incalculable damage to our national security position, and will continue to constrain options for improvement in that position in the foreseeable future.

Other problems have been created by developments with American higher education over this same period. The student upheavals of the 1960s led to sweeping reforms in the universities whose effects are only now being fully felt. ROTC was driven off many college campuses, particularly the elite campuses of the Northeast, thus further accelerating the isolation of the military (whose officer class has always been drawn disproportionately from the South and West) from the opinion-forming sectors of American society. Scientific research for military purposes was drastically curtailed by university authorities. The general decline in high school and university standards, the drift toward “soft” subjects such as sociology and psychology and toward pre-professional training for law school, and the virtual abolition of distributional requirements in many universities have had a devastating effect on achievement levels in scientific and technical subjects and in languages. The sharp decline in the teaching even of basic science and mathematics is alarming. We face critical shortages of skilled personnel in many technical fields of direct relevance for national security, such as computers and advanced electronics. As far as foreign languages are concerned, many of the area studies programs initiated with much fanfare and money in the 1960s are moribund. Competence in critical major languages such as Russian, German, Chinese, Japanese and Arabic is increasingly difficult to come by; expertise in more exotic but potentially important languages and cultures (those of Soviet minority areas, for example, or of Southeast Asia) is virtually non-existent.

Less well known, but of comparable importance, are developments that have occurred within our military over the last several decades. It is customary in this country to regard the appearance of nuclear weapons as the latest revolution in the conduct of war; yet the invasion of military affairs at all levels by science and technology since the mid-1960s can well be considered—as it is by the Soviets—a second such revolution. A key effect of this revolution has been to blur the distinctive character of the military profession. The demand for scientific/technical skills has caused a basic shift in the focus of military education, and has increased dramatically the role of civilians from the academic and corporate sectors in the formulation of defense policy and the management of our defense establishment. All this has had a number of unfortunate consequences. Military officers have come increasingly to see themselves as technicians or managers rather than as strategists or leaders of men. Military planning has come to be dominated by the cost-accounting techniques of the corporate world and by a fascination with technology rather than by traditional strategy. And to the extent to which strategy has played a role, it has been strategy of an untraditional sort—abstract theory not rooted in an appreciation of military history or of differences in political and military culture.

It is very largely owing to such conceptual deficiencies that we find ourselves in our current difficulties in the strategic nuclear area; and many are convinced that our failure in Vietnam resulted directly from a combination of poor strategy and personnel practices more suited to business corporations than to the military.

In attempting to address this complex of problems, it must be acknowledged at the outset that any effort by this Administration to influence American educational policies or activities is likely to be resisted with greater or lesser vigor not only by its ideological opponents but also by many sympathizers who tend to be sceptical of the federal government's role in this area. Accordingly, considerable caution will be necessary in deciding whether or how to pursue particular initiatives. Still, certain steps could be taken immediately—particularly with respect to military education—that would be relatively uncontroversial. The following represents a rough attempt to identify the range of measures that could realistically be considered:

- encourage curriculum reform in the service academies and war colleges to shift emphasis away from technical subjects toward the study of political and military history and strategy (this is underway to some extent already);

- strengthen the ROTC program and return it to as many campuses as possible (the drying up of other sources of financial aid should facilitate this);

- review and, as appropriate, strengthen and expand federal programs that provide financial aid for language and area studies;

- review and, as appropriate, strengthen and expand federal programs that provide financial aid for critical scientific and technical studies;

—explore with private industry possible cooperative funding of post-graduate studies in advanced scientific and technical subjects;

—strengthen, domestic public information programs in the national security area, including possible use of public radio and television;

—work with state governments to develop a curriculum or materials on national security for high school civics courses (perhaps in conjunction with a revitalization of civil defense training).

Of these measures, the latter would be the most controversial, but it would approach closest to the root of the problem. At present, the young tend to be ignorant of the most elementary military and political facts of life, and their historical memory barely reaches back to Vietnam, not to speak of the 1930s and World War II. Because they have no exposure to such things in the normal course of their education, young people are highly vulnerable to the various forms of anti-military hysteria which seem on their way to becoming once more a significant factor in the domestic politics of western societies. We have been only slightly less irresponsible than the Europeans in refusing to face up to this problem and the grave threat it poses to the survival of free government. If we do not bite the bullet soon, we may lose our best opportunity.

52. Editorial Note

Assistant Secretary of State for African Affairs Chester Crocker addressed the African-American Institute Conference in Wichita, Kansas, on June 20, 1981. After highlighting the conference's importance, Crocker then outlined the U.S. objectives regarding its African policy:

“—We seek to promote peace and regional security and deny opportunities to those who seek contrary objectives.

“—We will support proven friends and be known as a reliable partner, in Africa as elsewhere.

“—We want to maintain open market opportunities, access to key resources, and contribute to expanding African and American economies.

“—We support negotiated solutions to the problems of southern Africa.

“—We seek to expand that group of nations whose development policies produce economic progress and which have flourishing democratic institutions.

“—We shall do our part in meeting Africa's humanitarian needs and in fostering basic human liberties in keeping with both our principles and our interests.

“Meeting these objectives is, of course, no easy task. But we begin with several advantages. First, we have laid out objectives which we can all understand. Second, these objectives are in keeping with basic American values. The policies we implement will not conceal them. To do so would indicate our own lack of confidence in those values and principles for which we as Americans have long been admired. They are an integral part of the comparative advantage we as Americans and the Western world in general have in Africa.

“Africa and Africans are already largely oriented toward the West. Yet that orientation, that advantage, cannot be taken for granted. Events of the last decade have proven only too clearly that the objectives we seek in Africa are increasingly threatened by political instability, external intervention, and declining economic performance. Soviet-Cuban and Eastern bloc intervention in African affairs, the presence of thousands of Cuban troops in Angola and Ethiopia, the presence of Libyan troops in Chad, and the massive transfers of arms by Eastern bloc nations all serve to undermine U.S. and Western interests in Africa and to thwart our and Africa’s objectives. The globe’s leading sources of destabilization are active in Africa. This Administration has no hesitation in stating that frankly, categorically, and for the record.

“Nor do we hesitate in our belief that economic development, a central imperative for a continent which contains two-thirds of the world’s poorest nations, cannot take place in an environment of instability or insecurity. In this respect, African nations are no different from other developing nations. Roads cannot be built, railroads cannot transport goods, wells cannot be dug, nor crops harvested when a nation is at war with itself or its neighbors. We will do our part in addressing Africa’s security needs. We have already proposed to the Congress increased levels of security assistance to certain key African nations in support of our objectives in Africa and in the Persian Gulf. By defining carefully our interests and commitments and by backing them up in credible ways, we believe the United States, in concert with our major allies, can play a significant role in addressing Africa’s security problems. We will stand together with our proven friends in Africa, offering them assistance and counsel rather than turning our backs on them in their time of need. To do otherwise would do injustice to our own values as a people, and it would prevent us from achieving our goals of peace, regional security, economic progress, and the expansion of human liberties.

“But let me make it quite clear that we do not choose nor have we any mandate to be the policeman of Africa. No nation has such a mandate. Our preferred choice is to foster and help implement, where we can, diplomatic solutions to Africa’s conflicts. In southern Africa as in the Horn of Africa, we seek a reduction of regional tensions. Those who characterize this Administration's goals differently are, simply put, wrong. We are committed to playing our proper role in creating a context for successful negotiations leading to internationally recognized independence for Namibia. We believe it is the task of the Western world to encourage purposeful, evolutionary change in South Africa toward a nonracial society. And we believe that all those who share our opposition to foreign intervention on African soil will acknowledge the need to find means to remove any pretexts for the presence of foreign troops in Angola."

In concluding his remarks, Crocker stated, "We believe that Africans, if given the choice, will seek strengthened relations with us and with you. We have shared goals. We have the wherewithal to produce results. The values and institutions upon which the greatness of this country was built offer a solid basis for the continued strengthening of African-American relations." (Department of State Bulletin, August 1981, pages 57–58, 59)

Washington, June 30, 1981

SUBJECT

Short-term Foreign Policy Objectives (U)

There follows in rough priority a list of foreign policy objectives over the short term (six months to one year). We have not followed a rigid pattern and each area specialist has described his objectives as he sees them. I have minimized the editorial function. (U)

1. Poland: Poland faces both an external threat and an internal crisis. The US objectives are:

—to preserve the favorable political evolution in Poland, and to assist Poland to deal with its massive economic problems if it is not invaded.

—If Poland is invaded or taken over by the Soviet Union, then our objective becomes to make Russia pay the maximum price short of war.

2. Persian Gulf and Southwest Asian Strategy: To develop the military forces and infrastructure necessary to deter further direct or indirect Soviet aggression in this area. The cornerstones of this strategy are cooperation with our European allies and with Egypt, Israel, Saudi Arabia, and Jordan. Relationships with these countries must be strengthened in all areas, including military. An immediate task is to effect a tacit understanding involving Israel and Saudi Arabia in order to get the AWACS sale through Congress.²

3. Arab/Israel: To secure the peace treaty between Egypt and Israel;³ to work toward a resolution of the Lebanon crisis;⁴ to resume autonomy negotiations on the status of the Gaza Strip and the West Bank.⁵ Immediate tasks are to continue the Habib Mission for Lebanon⁶ and to resume the autonomy negotiations at the most appropriate time.

² Reference is to the proposed sale of AWACS radar planes to the Government of Saudi Arabia. In February, Reagan administration officials informed Congress that the administration planned to sell the Saudis AIM-9L Sidewinder air-to-air missiles and fuel tanks for the F-15s and had agreed "in principle" to sell tanker planes and possibly AWACS. During his April trip to the Middle East (see Document 40 and footnote 2 thereto), Haig discussed the proposed sale with Begin, who voiced his opposition. On April 21, the White House announced that the administration would sell the Saudis five AWACS planes and additional equipment. (Congress and the Nation, vol. VI, 1981–1984, pp. 130–131) Documentation on the sale is scheduled for publication in Foreign Relations, 1981–1988, vol. XIX, Arab-Israeli Dispute, and Foreign Relations, 1981–1988, vol. XXII, Middle East Region; Arabian Peninsula.

³ Reference is to the Egypt-Israel Peace Treaty signed in Washington by Sadat and Begin on March 26, 1979; see footnote 2, Document 17.

4. Afghanistan/Pakistan/India: To support the buildup of Pakistan's economic and non-nuclear military strength while improving relations with India; to keep the pressure on the Soviets to withdraw from Afghanistan.

5. El Salvador: To begin winning the war in El Salvador with an improved US effort. We have drawn the line in El Salvador—our prestige is committed. The present effort has proved insufficient for the long term and the loss of El Salvador could have a damaging affect on Guatemala and Honduras.

6. South Africa/Namibia: To develop a solution in Namibia which brings about independence but precludes the establishment of a Marxist-Leninist Soviet-oriented regime. Diplomatic efforts to arrive at a proposed solution which meets South African core concerns and yet allows for independence which will result in the installation of a popularly-elected, non-Marxist-Leninist regime should be continued. Some form of UN-supervised elections will be desirable to obtain some degree of international acceptance of the new regime.

7. Cuba. To reduce Cuban subversion in this hemisphere, and in other Third World countries by developing a broad-gauged strategy involving the entire Caribbean for the next three to four years. Cuba is the center for regional instability and will not be stopped by American rhetoric. Therefore, we should increase the costs to the Cubans of sending and maintaining military expeditionary forces to such countries as Angola and Ethiopia.

—Finish plans for a Radio Free Cuba within two to three weeks and release the White Paper on Cuban covert operations.⁷

8. Nicaragua: To keep Nicaragua from going wholly communist by drawing on the lessons of the past (such as Cuba 1959–60,⁸ Portugal 1974–75).⁹ Announce Administration's interest in legislation closing down Nicaraguan exile commando camps in Florida and keep our major allies fully informed on the arms buildup in Nicaragua.

⁷ Reference is to a special report on Cuban covert activities in the southern hemisphere, which the Department intended to release as a White Paper. In telegram 168651 to multiple Latin American diplomatic and consular posts, June 26, Enders sent the draft summary of conclusions of the report, requesting that posts review the draft and provide comments. (Department of State, Central Foreign Policy File, Electronic Telegrams, [no N number]) The Department released a 37-page version of the report on December 14, in conjunction with Enders's testimony before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee subcommittee on Western Hemisphere Affairs. (Gerald F. Seib, "U.S. Asserts Cuba Has Tried to Trigger Armed Revolt in 13 Latin Nations Since '78," Wall Street Journal, p. 14, and "Enders: U.S. Tightening Embargo of Cuba," Washington Post, p. A6; both December 15, 1981)

⁸ Reference is to the Cuban nationalist revolution, led by Fidel Castro against Fulgencio Batista.

⁹ Reference is to the April 1974 military coup in Portugal, also known as the Carnation Revolution.

9. Japan: To increase Japan's contributions to our joint defense effort without destabilizing the political structure there. This will involve coordinated pressure by our Administration, without publicity, on the Japanese to beef up their defense efforts and expand their defense perimeters.

10. Europe:

To shape and maintain the political cohesion of the TNF-basing countries in NATO in order to secure effective deployment of modernized theatre systems in Central Europe.

A growing wave of quasi-neutralist and pacifist sentiment is affecting public attitudes in key allied countries, particularly in the Federal Republic of Germany. The political leaderships of these countries are weak and indecisive, and the U.S. must expend a major effort to buck them up; failure to do so could well jeopardize timely implementation of the December 1979 two-track decision¹⁰ on long range theatre nuclear forces.

The U.S. should greatly intensify its information programs keyed to TNF in Europe, with special emphasis on the magnitude of the Soviet threat as documented by hard evidence. This may entail declassification of some sensitive material in order to provide the most cogent and convincing presentation for public consumption. ICA should be a lead agency in the effort. We should work closely with allied governments to ensure their cooperation and to help generate a more aggressive leadership role on their part.

11. China/Taiwan: To reassure Taiwan of our support while strengthening our relations with Peking. This involves striking the correct balance between supplying arms to Taiwan and expanding our involvement in the Chinese modernization process, including its military sector.

—On the Taiwan side, weapons sales to Taiwan should be resumed, Taiwan should be authorized to open one new office and our contacts with Taiwan should be elevated.

—On the Peking side, we need to intensify our exchanges with the Chinese military, begin strategic consultations, and implement effectively the President's directive on licensing dual-technology transfer.

12. Africa "Z" States: To resist Soviet efforts to destabilize Zaire, Zambia, and Zimbabwe—which countries supply vital strategic minerals to the U.S., such as chrome, cobalt, vanadium, etc. These countries are the targets of increasing Soviet efforts at destabilization. Plans for increased assistance to Zaire should go forward. Holding actions in Zambia and Zimbabwe should be intensified to retain our access to these minerals by having acceptable working relations with the governments.

13. Latin America: To coordinate the efforts of the “giants” of the hemisphere—Mexico, Colombia, Brazil, Argentina, Venezuela—on a series of international items such as trade, security, nuclear non-proliferation. Carry out Quadrapartite meeting in Nassau—follow it up with other slightly expanded meetings of the major Latin American countries.¹¹

14. Soviet Union

To establish links to a possible new Kremlin leadership. Given the age and physical condition of Brezhnev, a change in the Soviet Union is a distinct possibility. A power struggle may ensue with profound effects on Soviet foreign policy. If this occurs, the U.S. should be prepared to take advantage of opportunities in this new succession leadership.

15. Vietnam/Cambodia/ASEAN: To reduce the Vietnamese threat by working with ASEAN and China to bring about an acceptable solution to Vietnamese occupation of Cambodia¹² and reduce Soviet influence in this area.

—To coordinate the efforts at the United Nation’s special meeting on Cambodia scheduled for mid-July which is designed to put pressure on Vietnam to withdraw its troops, and at the same time hold out the possibility of future cooperation if Vietnam is prepared to make a deal.¹³

16. France

To ensure that France under a Socialist President¹⁴ and government remains a loyal ally and an effective security partner of the United States.

¹⁴ Reference is to Mitterrand.

The election of a Socialist President and parliament in France for the first time since 1957, and for the inclusion of Communist ministers within that government for the first time since the immediate post-war period, could have an adverse effect on French capacity to play a vigorous role in the defense of the West. Though the conciliatory tone of the President's initial contacts with the new French leadership and the June visit of Vice President Bush to Paris¹⁵ have gotten the relationship off to a constructive start, we must carefully watch the evolution of events within France and work to influence French policy along pro-Alliance lines.

Use the Economic Summit meeting in Ottawa as the time and occasion for hammering out initial bilateral understandings with the French on economic policy; European policy; and approach to Third world issues.

17. Spain

To encourage, and where possible tangibly assist the evolution of democratic institutions and government in Spain.

Democracy in post-Franco Spain confronts three major interrelated challenges, dramatized by a recent coup attempt: (1) separatist pressures, primarily in the Basque provinces; (2) ruthless terrorist activity which derives much of its force from the separatist movement; and (3) temptations on the part of military malcontents and others who see the solution to both terrorism and separatism in a return to authoritarian rule.¹⁶ U.S. strategic interests in Spain, including an essential military base presence, require effective support for Spain's constitutional monarchy and parliamentary structures.

A highly visible State visit by the President or Vice President to Spain, which would symbolize U.S. interest in the country at the highest level; dramatize our respect for Spanish democracy; and provide moral support for King Juan Carlos and the Calvo Sotelo government.

INTERNATIONAL ECONOMIC ISSUES

I. Polish Economy

The Polish economy is in terrible condition and getting worse. That fact, coupled with others, presents both us and the Soviet Union with difficult choices. In our case, the extent to which we can and should attempt to help the Poles.

¹⁵ Bush visited Paris, June 23–24, to meet with Mitterrand, Cheysson, and de Laboulaye. ¹⁶ See footnote 12, Document 43.

II. Siberian Gas Pipeline

Germany, France and Italy want to finance the construction of a pipeline from the Soviet gas fields to lessen their dependence on Gulf oil supplies.¹⁷ We feel that the project will make them unacceptably dependent on the Soviet Union.

III. International Trade

The two principal issues here are resistance to the rising tide of protectionist sentiment here and abroad and the question of export credits, which has led to an unhealthy competition to offer costly financing terms (see also point 4).

IV. East-West Trade

We believe that trade restrictions on strategic grounds with the Soviet bloc should be tightened, especially in the area of technology transfer. Our allies, many of which are much more dependent on East bloc commerce than we are, are not enthusiastic about further tightening.

V. International Debt

Many less developed and some East European countries have developed a level of external debt beyond their capacity to repay. These countries, as well as the banks which have lent them money, pressure constantly for various forms of costly bailout.

VI. North-South Issues

We believe that traditional economic aid is in many cases ineffective for various reasons. The implementation of this view brings us into conflict with almost all less developed countries as well as some of our allies.

VII. Energy

Assurance of an adequate and secure supply of energy, especially oil and gas, is a constant preoccupation for American foreign policy.

VIII. Exchange Policy

The issue here is the desire on the part of most foreign countries to have greater exchange stability for the world's principal reserve currency—the U.S. dollar. We have announced a policy of non-intervention in the exchange markets, except in cases of emergency.¹⁸

IX. International Financial Institutions

We believe that the policies and practices of the international financial institutions should be examined with a view to making them leaner, more efficient and more productive. Many other countries view our attitude as being a screen to reduce our commitments.

GLOBAL ISSUES

I. Non-Proliferation

After enunciating our broad policy,¹⁹ we will need to develop steps for dealing with proliferation problems in several cases (notably Pakistan-India and Middle East) and for strengthening our efforts with key nuclear suppliers on cooperation and conditions for supply.

II. Human Rights

We must develop a comprehensive policy to guide our public pronouncements on this subject as well as our decisions on multilateral loans, arms sales, etc., where consideration of human rights is mandated by law.

¹⁸ In his May 4 testimony before the Joint Economic Committee, Under Secretary Sprinkel indicated that the Department of the Treasury had completed a review of U.S. exchange market intervention, focusing on the period after the transition to floating exchange rates in March 1973. Sprinkel stated: "In conjunction with our emphasis on improving the performance of the domestic U.S. economy, we intend to return to the more limited pre-1978 concept of intervention by intervening only when necessary to counter conditions of disorder in the market. As in the past, we will not attempt to define disorderly market conditions in advance. When making a decision concerning whether exchange market conditions justify intervention, we will consult closely with authorities in other major currency governments. As also in the past, the Treasury and the Federal Reserve will keep the public informed regarding U.S. exchange market intervention policy." (International Economic Policy: Hearing Before the Joint Economic Committee, Congress of the United States, Ninety-Seventh Congress, First Session, May 4, 1981 (Washington: Government Printing Office, 1981), p. 5)

¹⁹ Presumable reference to Reagan's response to a question regarding the "proper role of the United States" in preventing the spread of nuclear weapons and technology posed at his June 16 news conference (see Document 49): "Well, our position is—and it is unqualified—that we're opposed to the proliferation of nuclear weapons and do everything in our power to prevent it. I don't believe, however, that that should carry over into the development of nuclear power for peaceful purposes. And so, it increases the difficulty, if you're going to encourage the one, because you have at least opened a crack in the door where someone can proceed to the development of weapons." He continued, "But I'm not only opposed to the proliferation of nuclear weapons, but, as I've said many times, I would like to enter into negotiations leading toward a definite, verifiable reduction of strategic nuclear weapons worldwide." (Public Papers: Reagan, 1981, p. 521)

III. Law of the Sea

We must develop an approach to LOS negotiations consonant with a number of U.S. interests and objectives.

IV. International Communications

We need to reexamine policy in the area of international radio broadcasting to support needed modernization of VOA and RFE/RL technical facilities; there is a general need for overhaul of our international information effort and for upgrading ICA and strengthening its role in the foreign policy process.

SUBJECT

The President's Comments on the Future of Marxism in China (S)

I understand from both Rich Armitage and Don Gregg that the President said to Fraser that the Chinese, after the passing of the long marchers, would move away from Marxism.² (S)

I can understand how the President could reach this judgment:

—He correctly believes that Marxism is a deteriorating political system. It simply has not worked and evidently a new permutation should arise. (S)

² Australian Prime Minister Fraser visited the United States, June 29–July 1. He met privately with the President in the Oval Office on June 30 from 10:28 until 11:19 a.m. From 11:19 a.m. until 12:15 p.m. the President, Fraser, and other U.S. and Australian officials met in the Cabinet Room. In his personal diary entry for June 30, the President wrote: “Good meetings reinforcing a most unique friendship which exists between our 2 countries.” (Brinkley, ed., The Reagan Diaries, vol. I, January 1981–October 1985, p. 52)

—Haig has been saying that ideology in China is almost dead. He compares his 1972 trip³ where ideology dominated to his 1981 trip⁴ where few ideological remarks were made. Hence, his conclusion. The Secretary unfortunately does not read Chinese and therefore did not scan the People's Daily, which is still loaded with Marxism, Leninism and Maoism.⁵ (S)

—Holdridge has said publicly recently that the Chinese economy is a market economy and based on pure pragmatism.⁶ Expert economists on China were shocked to hear this coming from him because the facts do not support this. (S)

I have asked CIA to come up with a short, concise paper on the Chinese economy and the role of Marxism, now and in the foreseeable future. I have asked them for a one-page of key judgments and have told them I want this for high level readership.⁷ (S)

I have taught The Chinese Economy at the graduate school level for 3 years and I can assure you that the base of the Chinese economy is Marxism/Leninism—central planning and government ownership of the means of production. The moves away from this are on the edges and are done only after great struggle.⁸ (S)

55. Information Memorandum From the Director of the Bureau of Politico-Military Affairs (Burt) and the Director of the Policy Planning Staff (Wolfowitz) to Secretary of State Haig¹

Washington, July 1, 1981

SUBJECT

Suggested Priorities for You during the Next Four Months²

Despite the charges of Reston, Vance, and others, that the Administration has no foreign policy, we believe we have in fact gotten off to a solid start.³ The President's economic recovery program is about to pass the Congress⁴ and we have begun the revitalization of our military forces. TNF and our relationships with the NATO Allies are broadly on track (with France as an unsettling wild card) and your visit to Asia⁵ has reestablished our deep security interest in that region and the importance of China in the global balance. The Soviets and their proxies meanwhile, have been put on notice that we expect a new brand of responsible behavior from them. Indeed, only the lifting of the grain sanctions against the Soviet Union may have any lasting negative consequences for our foreign policy.⁶

We have not yet made any of the major blunders that plagued the last Administration's foreign policy even in its first few months.⁷ The current spate of criticism that we lack a foreign policy will not gain much purchase, especially not outside of Washington, unless we begin

Secret; Sensitive. Not for the system. Drafted by Blackwill. Haig's stamped initials appear in the top right-hand corner of the memorandum. Bremer initialed the memorandum and wrote "7/15." He also initialed the top-right hand corner of the memorandum and wrote "7/20."

⁴ The economic recovery program, introduced by the President in his February 18 message and March 10 FY 1982 budget proposals (see footnote 2, Document 39), outlined both individual and business tax cuts as well as spending cuts designed to reduce inflation and increase productivity. Presumably, Wolfowitz and Burt are referring to the tax and budget reconciliation legislation then pending in Congress. The President would subsequently approve both the Economic Recovery Tax Act of 1981 (H.R. 4242; P.L. 97-34; 95 Stat. 172) and the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1981 (H.R. 3982; P.L. 97-35; 95 Stat. 357) on August 13.

⁵ See footnote 4, Document 54.

to act in ways that suggest confusion weakness or disarray.⁸ However, if we begin to have tangible failures, it will be seen as proof of the contention that our policy is merely a collection of ad hoc actions without a design.⁹

*There are, in light of the above considerations, several important issues approaching critical decision points.*¹⁰ These decisions will affect the immediate perception here and abroad of our skill in managing the country's foreign policy and will determine to a considerable extent the stability of the base from which we will build our policies in the next three and one-half years. If we fail to address successfully these matters, if you are diverted by the innumerable, but largely passing problems which will vie for your attention, the Administration's foreign policy will be hard put to recover any time soon.¹¹ Thus, we recommend that in the next four months or so you concentrate above all else in putting your personal imprint on the following issues which will be joined during this period.¹²

(1) The MX and Bomber decisions. If we stumble here we will pay for it for the rest of the century.¹³

(2) AWACS. We must win on the Hill or our whole strategy for the Middle East and Persian Gulf will be still-born. We must not only win the vote; we must do so in a way that persuades people that we have a serious strategy, not merely a policy of pleasing the Saudis and selling arms to anyone who wants them.¹⁴

⁸ Haig underlined "will not gain much purchase, especially not outside."

¹⁰ Haig highlighted this sentence beginning with "several" through the end.

(3) Aircraft for Pakistan. Whether through early F-16 deliveries or an enhanced F-5 package, we must meet Zia's basic requirements in order to maintain the momentum of our renewed relationship with the Paks.¹⁵

(4) Security Assistance. A failure to reverse the Long Appropriation Subcommittee's decision to eliminate concessional FMS financing will have a devastating impact on our relations with friends around the world, and especially on Egypt and Turkey.¹⁶

(5) Caribbean Basin. We must convince the naysayers that our new policy is more than rhetoric, and that over time it will fundamentally alter both the internal instabilities in a region on which Cuba preys, and Castro's capacity to export revolution there.¹⁷

Success or failure on these issues is largely a question of Congressional politics and internal bureaucratic politics in Washington. This means that the perceived success of your foreign policy over the next six months will depend more on what we do within the US Government than on what we do in our relations with others.¹⁸ While we need to develop our thinking on foreign policy initiatives that will begin to be decisive five or six months from now, particularly arms control and the Middle East peace process, and although we may be forced to attend to crises that could arise in Poland, El Salvador or Iran or between Egypt and Libya or Israel and Syria, your primary focus needs to be on winning these internal issues.¹⁹

¹⁵ Haig highlighted this point's heading and wrote in the margin: "we'll handle OK! Cap likes it!!!" Reference is to the proposed sale of 40 F-16 planes to Pakistan, as part of a larger military and economic aid package for that country. Although the Carter administration had suspended development assistance and IMET in April 1979, the Reagan administration proposed the 6-year aid package, partly to counter Soviet actions in Afghanistan. Documentation on the sale is scheduled for publication in Foreign Relations, 1981-1988, vol. XXXIII, South Asia.

¹⁷ Haig highlighted this point's heading and wrote at the end of the paragraph: "we can win this & are doing so!!!"

¹⁸ Haig highlighted this and the previous sentence.

¹⁹ Haig highlighted the portion of this sentence beginning with the word "your" and ending with "issues." He also underlined "winning these internal issues." He drew an arrow from the bottom margin back to this sentence and wrote: "problem is they are no longer mine they are in hands of others you know that. I would suggest a completely different set—1) War in ME. 2) articulating a F.P. 3) getting [unclear] order 4) US/USSR relationship (maybe # 1—Stop reading news items think strategically."

Finally, we agree with you that the time has come for you to give a series of speeches which systematically lay out the Administration's approach to the major foreign policy questions we face. If we can resolve the five issues listed above in a sensible way while we creep forward on the Palestinian problem and on Southern Africa, and if you use the bully pulpit, we are confident that historians will see this Administration's first year of foreign policy as one of the most coherent and effective in a very long time.²⁰

²⁰ Below this paragraph, Haig wrote: "don't agree—see me you & Paul—and I'll explain why this is so—nevertheless you are not all wrong—just too theatrical!!!! AMH."

56. Address by Secretary of State Haig¹

New York, July 14, 1981

Arms Control for the 1980s: An American Policy

I do want to say I'm very, very pleased to have an opportunity to talk again before the Foreign Policy Association. I've always believed that an effective policy abroad must be the product of support for that policy here at home. And this association and its activities have clearly made a major contribution to that requirement here in America. It has always sharpened the issues for the American people and enabled them to decide for themselves on these fundamental issues. And it is just such an issue that I would like to discuss today, and that is the vitally important issue of the future of arms control in this decade of the 1980s facing Americans. There is hardly a subject which enjoys or is a focus of greater international attention, especially recently, among our allies in Western Europe, and with good cause.

This is true because we are living in an age when man has conceived the means of his own destruction. The supreme interest of the United States has been to avoid the extremes of either nuclear catastrophe or

President Reagan stands in this tradition. He understands the dangers of unchecked nuclear arms. He shares the universal aspiration for a more secure and peaceful world. But he also shares the universal disappointment that the arms control process has delivered less than it has promised.

One of the President's first acts was to order an intense review of arms control policy, the better to learn the lessons of the past in the hope of achieving more lasting progress for the future. Two fundamental conclusions have emerged from this review.

First, the search for sound arms control agreements should be an essential element of our program for achieving and maintaining peace.

Second, such agreements can be reached if negotiations among adversaries about their national security interests are not dominated by pious hopes and simplistic solutions.

The task of arms control is enormously complex. It must be related to the nation's security needs and perspectives. Above all, arms control policy must be seen in the light of international realities. As Churchill put it: "You must look at the facts because they look at you." An American arms control policy for this decade must take into account the facts about our security and the lessons that we have learned about what works—and what does not work—in arms control.

Despite the extraordinary efforts at arms control during the 1970s, the world is a less secure place than it was 10 years ago. We began the process with the expectation that it would help to secure the deterrent forces of both the United States and the Soviet Union. But Moscow's strategic buildup has put at risk both our crucial land-based missiles and our bombers. Simultaneously, the Soviets have continued a massive buildup of conventional forces and have used them with increasing boldness. Their armies and those of their surrogates have seized positions that threaten resources and routes critical to Western security.

We cannot blame our approach to arms control alone for our failure to restrain the growth and use of Soviet power. The Soviet Union did not feel compelled to agree to major limitations and adequate verification in part because the United States did not take steps needed to maintain its own strategic and conventional capabilities. Nor did we respond vigorously to the use of Soviet force. The turmoil of the 1960s, Vietnam, and Watergate all contributed to this passivity. As a result, the basis for arms control was undermined. We overestimated the extent to which the Strategic Arms Limitation Talks would help to ease other tensions. We also underestimated the impact that such tensions would have on the arms control process itself.

This experience teaches us that arms control can only be one element in a comprehensive structure of defense and foreign policy designed to reduce the risks of war. It cannot be the political centerpiece or the crucial barometer of U.S.-Soviet relationships, burdening arms control with a crushing political weight. It can hardly address such issues as the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, the Iran-Iraq war, the Vietnamese invasion of Kampuchea³—which is the subject of our U.N. conference here this week—the Libyan invasion of Chad, or Cuban intervention in Africa and Latin America. Instead, arms control should be an element—a single element—in a full range of political, economic, and military efforts to promote peace and security.

Principles

The lessons of history and the facts of international life provide the basis for a realistic set of principles to guide a more effective approach to arms control. All of our principles are derived from a recognition that the paramount aim of arms control must be to reduce the risks of war. We owe it to ourselves and to our posterity to follow principles wedded exclusively to that aim.

Our first principle is that our arms control efforts will be an instrument of, not a replacement for, a coherent allied security policy. Arms control proposals should be designed in the context of the security situation we face, our military needs, and our defense strategy. Arms control should complement military programs in meeting these needs. Close consultation with our allies is an essential part of this process, both to protect their interests and to strengthen the Western position in negotiations with the Soviet Union.

If, conversely, we make our defense programs dependent on progress in arms control, then we will give the Soviets a veto over our defenses and remove their incentive to negotiate fair arrangements. Should we expect Moscow to respect parity if we demonstrate that we are not prepared to sacrifice to sustain it? Can we expect the Soviets to agree to limitations if they realize that, in the absence of agreement, we shall not match their efforts? In the crucial relationship between arms and arms control, we must not put the cart before the horse. There is little prospect of agreements with the Soviet Union that will help solve such a basic security problem as the vulnerability of our land-based missiles until we demonstrate that we have the will and the capacity to solve them without arms control, should that be necessary.

Our second principle is that we will seek arms control agreements that truly enhance security. We will work for agreements that make world peace more secure by reinforcing deterrence. On occasion it has been urged that we accept defective agreements in order "to keep the arms control process alive." But we are seeking much more than agreements for their own sake. We will design our proposals not simply in the interest of a speedy negotiation but so that they will result in agreements which genuinely enhance the security of both sides.

That is the greatest measure of the worth of arms control, not the money saved nor the arms eliminated. Indeed, valuable agreements can be envisioned that do not save money and that do not eliminate arms. The vital task is to limit and to reduce arms in a way that renders the use of the remaining arms less likely.

Just as arms control could not aim simply at reducing numbers, so it should not try simply to restrict the advance of technology. Some technological advances make everyone safer. Reconnaissance satellites, for instance, discourage surprise attacks by increasing warning and make verification of agreements possible. Submarines and other means of giving mobility to strategic systems enhance their survivability, reduce the advantage of preemptive strikes, and thus help to preserve the peace. Our proposals will take account of both the positive and the negative effects of advancing technology.

Whether a particular weapons system, and therefore a particular agreement, undermines or supports deterrence may change with the development of other weapons systems. At one time, fixed intercontinental ballistic missiles (ICBMs) were a highly stable form of strategic weapons deployments, but technological change has altered that. We need to design arms control treaties so that they can adapt flexibly to long-term changes. A treaty that, for example, had the effect of locking us into fixed ICBM deployments would actually detract from the objectives of arms control.

Our third principle is that we will seek arms control bearing in mind the whole context of Soviet conduct worldwide. Escalation of a crisis produced by Soviet aggression could lead to a nuclear war, particularly if we allowed an imbalance of forces to provide an incentive for a Soviet first strike. American foreign policy and defense policy, of which arms control is one element, must deter aggression, contain crisis, reduce sources of conflict, and achieve a more stable military balance—all for the purpose of securing the peace. These tasks cannot be undertaken successfully in isolation one from the other.

Soviet international conduct directly affects the prospects for success in arms control. Recognition of this reality is essential for a healthy arms control process in the long run. Such “linkage” is not the creation of U.S. policy: It is a fact of life. A policy of pretending that there is no linkage promotes reverse linkage. It ends up by saying that in order to preserve arms control, we have to tolerate Soviet aggression. This Administration will never accept such an appalling conclusion.

Our fourth principle is that we will seek balanced arms control agreements. Balanced agreements are necessary for a relationship based on reciprocity and essential to maintaining the security of both sides. The Soviet Union must be more willing in the future to accept genuine parity for arms control to move ahead. Each agreement must be balanced in itself and contribute to an overall balance.

Quantitative parity is important, but balance is more than a matter of numbers. One cannot always count different weapons systems as if they were equivalent. What matters is the capacity of either side to make decisive gains through military operations or threat of military operations. Agreements that do not effectively reduce the incentives to use force, especially in crisis situations, do nothing at all to enhance security.

Our fifth principle is that we will seek arms controls that include effective means of verification and mechanisms for securing compliance. Unverifiable agreements only increase uncertainties, tensions, and risks. The critical obstacle in virtually every area of arms control in the 1970s was Soviet unwillingness to accept the verification measures needed for more ambitious limitations. As much as any other single factor, whether the Soviets are forthcoming on this question will determine the degree of progress in arms control in the 1980s.

Failure of the entire arms control process in the long run can be avoided only if compliance issues are clearly resolved. For example, there have been extremely disturbing reports of the use of chemical weapons by the Soviets or their proxies in Afghanistan and in Southeast Asia. With full Western support the United Nations is now investigating the issue of chemical weapons.⁴ Similarly, in the spring of 1979, there was an extraordinary outbreak of anthrax in the Soviet city of Sverdlovsk.⁵ Despite continued probing, we still await a serious Soviet explanation as to whether it was linked to activities prohibited under the biological weapons convention.⁶

Our sixth principle is that our strategy must consider the totality of the various arms control processes and various weapons systems, not only those that are being specifically negotiated. Each U.S. weapons system must be understood not merely in connection with a corresponding Soviet system, but in relation to our whole strategy for deterring the Soviets from exploiting military force in general. In developing our theater nuclear arms control proposals, for example, we should consider the relationship of theater nuclear forces to NATO's overall strategy for deterring war in Europe. We cannot overlook the fact that our European strategy has always compensated for shortfalls in conventional capability through a greater reliance on theater and strategic nuclear forces. If we are to rely less on the nuclear elements in the future, the conventional elements will have to be strengthened.

Prospects

What then are the prospects for arms control in the 1980s? We could achieve quick agreements and an appearance of progress if we pursued negotiation for its own sake or for the political symbolism of continuing the process. But we are committed to serious arms control that truly strengthens international security. That is why our approach must be prudent, paced, and measured.

With a clear sense of direction and a dedication to the serious objectives of arms control, this Administration will strive to make arms control succeed. We will put our principles into action. We will conduct negotiations based on close consultation with our allies, guided by the understanding that our objective is enhanced security for all of our allies, not just for the United States. We will work with the Congress to insure that our arms control proposals reflect the desires of our people, and that, once agreements are negotiated, they will be ratified and their implementation fully supported. We will comply with agreements we make, and we will demand that others do likewise.

By the end of the year, the United States will be embarked upon a new arms control endeavor of fundamental importance, one designed to reduce the Soviet nuclear threat to our European allies. The impetus for these negotiations dates back to the mid-1970s when the Soviets began producing and deploying a whole new generation of nuclear systems designed not to threaten the United States—for their range was too short—but to threaten our European allies. These new weapons, and in particular the nearly 3,000-mile-range SS–20 missile, were not just modernized replacements for older systems. Because of their much greater range, their mobility, and above all their multiplication of warheads on each missile, these new systems presented the alliance with a threat of a new order of magnitude.

The pace of the Soviet buildup is increasing. Since the beginning of last year, the Soviets have more than doubled their SS–20 force. Already 750 warheads have been deployed on SS–20 launchers. The Soviet Union has continued to deploy the long-range Backfire bomber and a whole array of new medium- and short-range nuclear missiles and nuclear-capable aircraft. This comprehensive Soviet arms buildup is in no sense a reaction to NATO's defense program. Indeed, NATO did very little as this alarming buildup progressed.

In December 1979 the alliance finally responded in two ways. First, it agreed to deploy 464 new U.S. ground-launched cruise missiles in Europe and to replace 108 medium-range Pershing ballistic missiles already located there with modernized versions of greater range. Second, the alliance agreed that the United States should pursue negotiated limits on U.S. and Soviet systems in this category.

This two-track decision represents explicit recognition that arms control cannot succeed unless it is matched by a clear determination to take the defense measures necessary to restore a secure balance. On taking office, as one of its first foreign policy initiatives, this Administration announced its commitment to both tracks of the alliance decision—deployments and arms control. Last May, in Rome, we secured unanimous alliance endorsement of our decision to move ahead on both tracks and of our plan for doing so.⁷

Since then I have begun discussions in Washington with the Soviet Ambassador on this issue.⁸ When I meet with Soviet Foreign Minister Gromyko at the United Nations this September, I will seek agreement to start the U.S.-Soviet negotiations on these weapons systems by the end of this year.⁹ We would like to see the U.S. and Soviet negotiators meet to begin formal talks between mid-November and mid-December of this year. We intend to appoint a senior U.S. official with the rank of Ambassador as our representative at these talks.

⁷ See footnotes 3 and 6, Document 48.

⁸ In an undated memorandum to the President, Haig indicated that Dobrynin had delivered to him that day a letter from Brezhnev to Reagan, dated May 27. Haig noted that during their conversation, Dobrynin had expressed the Soviet desire to get the TNF talks underway. Haig continued, "I told him that the talks we will conduct between now and when Gromyko and I meet in September will be restricted to the modalities. I explained that the US had to engage in extensive consultations with its allies and prepare threat and requirement assessments so that when we begin negotiations we will know which systems will be involved. The TNF talks are not like the SALT talks where the US could act largely unilaterally. I argued that both we and the Soviets will be well served by these intensive preparations so that my discussions with Gromyko in September can be productive and businesslike." For the text of the memorandum and the text of Brezhnev's letter, see Foreign Relations, 1981–1988, vol. III, Soviet Union, January 1981–January 1983, Document 59.

Extensive preliminary preparations for this entirely new area of arms control are already underway in Washington and in consultation with our NATO allies in Brussels. Senior U.S. and European officials will continue to consult after the beginning of U.S.-Soviet exchanges. We and our allies recognize that progress can only come through complex, extensive, and intensive negotiations.

We approach these negotiations with a clear sense of purpose. We want equal, verifiable limits on the lowest possible level on U.S. and Soviet theater nuclear forces. Such limits would reduce the threat to our allies and bring to Europe the security undermined today by the Soviet buildup. We regard the threat to our allies as a threat to ourselves, and we will, therefore, spare no effort to succeed.

We are proceeding with these negotiations to limit the theater threat within the framework of SALT—the Strategic Arms Limitation Talks designed to limit the nuclear threat to the United States and the Soviet Union. In this area, too, we have initiated intense preparations. These preparations must take into account the decisions we will take shortly on modernizing our intercontinental ballistic missiles and our strategic bombers.

In the course of 10 years of SALT negotiations, conceptual questions have arisen which must be addressed. For instance, how have improvements in monitoring capabilities, on the one hand, and new possibilities for deception and concealment, on the other, affected our ability to verify agreements and to improve verification? Which systems are to be included in a SALT negotiation, and which should be discussed in other forums? How can we compare and limit the diverse U.S. and Soviet military arsenals in the light of new systems and new technologies emerging on both sides?

In each of these areas there are serious and pressing questions which must be answered to insure the progress of SALT in the 1980s and beyond. Only in this way can SALT become again a dynamic process that will promote greater security in the U.S.-Soviet relationship. We are determined to solve these problems and to do everything necessary to arrive at balanced reductions in strategic arsenals on both sides.

We should be prepared to pursue innovative arms control ideas. For example, negotiated confidence-building measures in Europe could provide a valuable means to reduce uncertainty about the character and purpose of the other side's military activities. While measures of this sort will not lessen the imperative of maintaining a military balance in Europe, they can reduce the dangers of miscalculation and surprise.

We are eager to pursue such steps in the framework of a European disarmament conference based on an important French proposal now being considered at the Madrid meeting of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe.¹⁰ We call upon the Soviets to accept this proposal, which could cover Soviet territory to the Urals. As we proceed in Madrid, we will do so on the basis of a firm alliance solidarity, which is the key to bringing the Soviets to accept serious and effective arms control measures.

Our efforts to control existing nuclear arsenals will be accompanied by new attempts to prevent the spread of nuclear weapons. The Reagan Administration is developing more vigorous policies for inhibiting nuclear proliferation.¹¹ We expect the help of others in this undertaking, and we intend to be a more forthcoming partner to those who share responsibility for nonproliferation practices. Proliferation complicates the task of arms control: It increases the risk of preemptive and accidental war, it detracts from the maintenance of a stable balance of conventional forces, and it brings weapons of unparalleled destructiveness to volatile and developing regions. No short-term gain in export revenue or regional prestige can be worth such risks.

It may be argued that the "genie is out of the bottle," that technology is already out of control. But technology can also be tapped for the answers. Our policies can diminish the insecurities that motivate proliferation. Responsible export practices can reduce dangers. And international norms can increase the cost of nuclear violations. With effort we can help to assure that nuclear plowshares are not transformed into nuclear swords.

In sum, the United States has a broad agenda of specific arms control efforts and negotiations already underway or soon to be launched. The charge that we are not interested in arms control or that we have cut off communications with the Soviets on these issues is simply not true.

The approach I have discussed today stands in a long and distinguished American tradition. We are confident that it is a serious and realistic approach to the enduring problems of arms control. The United States wants a more secure and a more peaceful world. And we know that balanced, verifiable arms control can contribute to that objective.

We are also confident that the Soviet leaders will realize the seriousness of our intent. They should soon tire of the proposals that seek to freeze NATO's modernization of theater nuclear weapons before it has even begun, while reserving for themselves the advantages of hundreds of SS-20s already deployed. They should see that the propaganda campaign intended to intimidate our allies and frustrate NATO's modernization program cannot and must not succeed. Arms control requires confidence, but it also requires patience.

Americans dream of a peaceful world, and we are willing to work long and hard to create it. This Administration is confident that its stance of patient optimism on arms control expresses the deepest hopes and the clearest thoughts of the American people.

It is one of the paradoxes of our time that the prospects for arms control depend upon the achievement of a balance of arms. We seek to negotiate a balance at less dangerous levels but meanwhile we must maintain our strength. Let us take to heart John F. Kennedy's reminder that negotiations "are not a substitute for strength—they are an instrument for the translation of strength into survival and peace."¹²

¹² Then-Senator Kennedy made these remarks during a speech delivered in the Senate on June 14, 1960.

57. Editorial Note

On July 19, 1981, President Ronald Reagan, Secretary of State Alexander Haig, Secretary of the Treasury Donald Regan, and Counselor to the President Edwin Meese departed Washington for Ottawa to attend the Group of 7 (G-7) Economic Summit meeting. Prior to their departure, Haig briefed the press assembled in the Old Executive Office Building. Towards the end of his remarks, he said: "Let me conclude my brief presentation by summarizing what I believe to be our basic objectives at this summit—to get to know the other leaders personally, develop rapport with them, understand their concerns, and make clear our sensitivity to these concerns; to explain U.S. economic and foreign policy goals; to demonstrate to the other leaders our determination to create a strong U.S. economy with stable prices, accepting necessary short-term costs in this effort; to strengthen our defenses and to keep our commitment to international consultation and cooperation and to keep it solid and enduring; to discuss the East-West relations, as well as other major crises areas." (Department of State Bulletin, August 1981, page 3)

The summit meeting took place both in Montebello, Quebec and in Ottawa from July 19 until July 21. Participants, in addition to Reagan, included Prime Minister Pierre Elliott Trudeau of Canada, President Francois Mitterrand of France, Chancellor Helmut Schmidt of the Federal Republic of Germany, Prime Minister Zenko Suzuki of Japan, Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher of the United Kingdom, Prime Minister Giovanni Spadolini of Italy, and Gaston Thorn, President of the Commission of the European Communities. Documentation on the summit meeting is scheduled for publication in Foreign Relations, 1981–1988, vol. XXXVI, Trade; Monetary Policy; Industrialized Country Cooperation, 1981–1984. Related documentation is scheduled for publication in Foreign Relations, 1981–1988, volume VII, Western Europe, 1981–1984, and Foreign Relations, 1981–1988, volume XLVII, Part 1, Terrorism, January 1977–May 1985. The texts of the Ottawa Economic Summit declaration, issued on July 21; the Summary of Political Issues, issued to the press by Trudeau on July 21 on behalf of all participants; and a Statement on Terrorism, also issued to the press by Trudeau on July 21 on behalf of all participants; are printed in Department of State Bulletin, August 1981, pages 8–9, 14–16.

Following the last session of the summit, held the afternoon of July 21, the participants offered their concluding remarks at 5:05 p.m. in the Opera House of the National Arts Centre. After thanking Trudeau for his hospitality, the President commented: "Not long ago, the conventional wisdom was that our seven nations were more sharply divided than any time in years. Only three of us had attended an economic summit before, and the rest of us are still in the first grade, the first-year class.

“To the outside world this looked like it would be a difficult summit. Inflation rates are running at incredible levels. Unemployment, I should say, disrupts the lives of millions of people, and new fears of protectionism are sweeping across our continents. The agenda of Montebello represented an enormous challenge for all of us. The true measure of these past 2 days, days filled with candid but always friendly talks, is that we leave with a true sense of common understanding and common purpose. We’ve discussed at great length how each one of us is addressing economic problems at home while working in concert to assure that we are sensitive to the impact of our actions upon our partners.

“I’m grateful to the other leaders here for their degree of understanding and support for the economic policies we’re embarked upon in the United States. We have also resolved that we shall resist protectionism and support an open, expanding system for multilateral trade. And, as you have been told by the Prime Minister, we shall work together in helping the developing nations move toward full partnership in that system.

“As Chancellor Schmidt has told us, our unity in economic matters is the best insurance we have against a return to the disastrous ‘beggar-thy-neighbor’ policies of another era. Economic unity and political unity are two great goals we must continue to pursue. All our nations share democratic institutions based on a belief in human dignity, freedom, and the preeminence of the individual. I believe that we depart with fresh confidence and optimism about the future of democratic values and our societies.

“Many uncertainties still lie ahead; much remains to be done. But, as an American, I would like to recall for you an inspiring story of my native land. It’s the story of young Franklin Roosevelt, who was struck down by polio in the prime of life and then, struggling to cover and to scale new heights. I mention it because much of that struggle took place on a little island not too far from here in New Brunswick, Canada, and the story is remembered by a very appropriate title, ‘Sunrise at Campobello.’

“Now, today, as we leave Montebello, I just can’t resist the suggestion that over the past few years our nations have suffered from an affliction too, an economic affliction. I hope sometime in the future people will look back and say that here, in these talks, we began to put our nations back on the road to economic recovery and that a new Sun rose at Montebello.

“That is a hope I know all of us share. Thank you very much.”

58. Memorandum From Secretary of State Haig to the Counselor to the President (Meese)¹

Washington, August 15, 1981

SUBJECT

FY 1982 Security and Development Assistance Legislation

With passage of the critical domestic economic legislation, it is imperative that we now turn our attention to enactment of the FY 1982 security and development assistance authorization and appropriations bills and raise these to the top of the White House legislative agenda.

The Administration has constructed an ambitious international security policy to sustain our leadership role and fortify the defense of our national interests. The credibility and success of this policy depend mainly on significant improvements in our defense posture and a parallel strengthening of allied and friendly forces. These two major and complementary objectives are of the highest priority; they require increased budgetary levels.

We are, however, confronted by the prospect of failure. Thus far, Congress has not enacted authorization and appropriations legislation for the FY 1982 foreign assistance program. For the third consecutive year the program is threatened with a continuing resolution which would provide substantially less than we need. The security assistance shortfall could be as much as $1.5 billion below the $6.8 billion program authority request.

Key Democrats including HFAC Chairman Zablocki are willing to approve most aspects of the program, but are unwilling to take the lead, as in previous years, without assurances of strong Republican support.

¹ Source: Reagan Library, Executive Secretariat, NSC Subject File, [Security Assistance] Foreign Aid, (May 1981–August 1981). Confidential. Also scheduled for publication in Foreign Relations, 1981–1988, vol. XXXVIII, International Economic Development; International Debt; Foreign Assistance.

Many Republican House members, however, do not yet believe that the White House is interested in the legislation and have not been willing to support it. This perception reinforces a traditional House antipathy toward foreign assistance.

If we cannot get foreign assistance bills this year, Israel will be about the only security assistance country program to survive in reasonable shape. Egypt, Turkey, Sudan, Kenya, Portugal, El Salvador, and Thailand among others, plus our initiatives for Military Assistance and Economic Support special requirements funds to meet unanticipated needs, will suffer irreparable damage. Key development assistance programs such as those in Africa and Central America will be reduced. A dangerous precedent would also be set for FY 1983 for which we are planning major augmentations.

In sum, if the resources necessary to carry out this Administration's foreign policy are to be available in FY 82, the Congress, particularly Republican members, must understand that the White House regards urgent passage of this program to be critical to its foreign policy objectives. Successful enactment will require the full resources of the White House staff. I strongly urge that you place foreign assistance legislation as one of the two or three highest congressional priorities of the Administration.²

²Haig wrote in the bottom margin of the memorandum: "Ed—I cannot over emphasize how critical this issue is becoming. There will be no hope of carrying the day unless the Pres. and the senior W.H. staff get behind this issue now. Thanks. Al."

U.S. Economic Policy Toward Developing Countries and Global Negotiations

Our experience at the Ottawa Summit has underscored the importance of developing countries in international economic policy.² Your participation in the late October Cancun Summit with Heads of State from developed and developing countries will draw attention to outstanding issues in this area, especially with the global negotiations issue looming in the background.³ The September-October period would provide an excellent “window” for you to make a major policy speech to assert U.S. leadership in the international economic arena and dispel misimpressions of your Administration’s attitude toward developing countries.

Foreign assistance traditionally has been viewed as a stimulus to economic growth in developing countries. Domestically, your Administration has rejected the notion that government transfers and intervention provide a necessary impetus for business activity. Vigorous economic activity and growth result from allowing the market place to allocate scarce economic resources and determine appropriate kinds of productive activity. This basic proposition is no less valid in developing countries, although it is not always popular with their governments.

As in domestic economic policy, so in international economic policy, aggressive yet practical leadership to cope with economic ills brought on by inflation and slow growth has been lacking. Industrialized countries realize they cannot sustain ever-growing foreign aid levels while their domestic economies are weak. Developing nations must appreciate that accumulating debts to finance consumption merely mortgages their future and can be no substitute for sound domestic economic policies. Successful economic growth is based largely upon internal generation of capital and foreign private financial flows.

A major policy address—perhaps at the annual meeting of the World Bank and International Monetary Fund in late September—could bring these ideas together, put them in perspective, and supply the basis for U.S. leadership at Cancun and thereafter.

The speech could:

- underscore our concern and compassion for developing countries’ economic problems;
- stress that the fundamental issue, nevertheless, is for all to get their internal houses in order (as we are doing);

³ Reference is to the upcoming international meeting on cooperation and development, scheduled to take place in Cancun, October 22–23. Haig attended the third preparatory meeting of foreign ministers, which took place in Cancun, August 1–2. —emphasize the full range of U.S. (and other industrialized country) contributions to the economic betterment of developing countries via the private market (trade, investment, technology, private capital flows) as well as aid; —confirm our commitment to provide foreign assistance to the poorer developing countries;

—reject the artificial division of the world along North-South lines and offer instead to examine concrete problems on a pragmatic basis (such as we are beginning to do in the Caribbean); and

—clearly state U.S. concern over the prospect of Global Negotiations undermining the integrity of existing institutions, which are fully competent to handle emerging problems.

As you are aware, the proposed U.N.-based Global Negotiations will be a major issue this fall.⁴ “GN”, which has been stalled primarily by U.S. objections, would create a central negotiating body under U.N. auspices to conduct—in some fashion yet to be determined—interrelated negotiations across a range of economic issues.

Our basic problem with Global Negotiations centers on the strong likelihood that the competence, integrity, and role of existing international institutions—especially the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank—would be undermined and distorted if they were allowed to proceed. A new international bureaucracy simply is not needed. The Fund, Bank, and other specialized international institutions are well equipped to handle the proposed topics for negotiation. Food, trade, development finance, and international monetary matters are the concern of established international organizations. Energy is the only proposed topic without such a forum.

Global Negotiations are a ‘no-win’ situation. Although the negotiations themselves are likely to follow a “consensus” approach, the sheer volume of developing country voting power in the U.N. (119 of 154 votes) would likely force us to choose between a highly damaging substantive outcome and blocking the conference. Thus, any favorable political atmosphere generated by a decision to move forward with Global Negotiations would soon dissipate.

Economic problems of developing countries—which are increasingly important in our trade and political relations—must be addressed. The United States should provide leadership to this end. The best approach, however, would be to redirect existing organizations to resolve concrete problems. We will gain nothing by encouraging political debates on these problems in the U.N. where inevitably the developing countries act and vote as a bloc. My own view is that it would be better, in effect, to break off the engagement now than be confronted with a very costly divorce later on. You could signal your inclination to do so by an appropriate passage in the speech I am recommending.

60. Editorial Note

On September 11, 1981, Secretary of State Alexander Haig departed Washington for Marabella, Spain, in order to meet with Deputy Prime Minister Crown Prince Fahd of Saudi Arabia on September 12. Haig then flew to Belgrade to meet with Yugoslavian President Sergji Kraigher and other Yugoslavian officials, September 12–13. On September 13, Haig addressed the Berlin Press Association in West Berlin, before departing for Bonn in order to meet with West German Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher, September 13–14. Documentation on Haig's meetings with Fahd, Kraigher, and Genscher, are scheduled for publication in Foreign Relations, 1981–1988, volume XXII, Middle East Region; Arabian Peninsula; Foreign Relations, 1981–1988, volume X, Eastern Europe; and Foreign Relations, 1981–1988, volume VII, Western Europe, 1981–1984, respectively.

Earlier, in a September 8 memorandum to Department of State speechwriter Harvey Sicherman, Director of the Policy Planning Staff Paul Wolfowitz discussed Haig's upcoming address before the Berlin Press Association. He expressed his belief that it was "essential for the Berlin speech explicitly to reaffirm U.S. commitment to defend West Berlin and support for the Four-Power Agreement." He continued, "According to Reuters, August 21, a West German Government spokesman said Haig is 'expected to renew the U.S. commitment to West Berlin's freedom and security,' to 'stress the special ties between the United States and Berlin and affirm Washington's support for the 1971 Four-Power Agreement.' The Secretary himself is quoted in Saturday's [September 4] New York Times as saying 'When I go to Europe I'm going first to West Berlin and I will give a speech and it's designed to be a reaffirmation of the American commitment to the freedom of the city. That is a historic requirement and one which I take very seriously.'"

Before suggesting additional language to be inserted into the address, Wolfowitz stressed: "If the speech does not follow through on these promises, we will invite extremely unwelcome speculation. I understand that Genscher has specifically requested this point to be made." (Department of State, Executive Secretariat, S/P Files, Memoranda and Correspondence from the Director of the Policy Planning Staff to the Secretary and Other Seventh Floor Principals: Lot 89D149, S/P Chrons PW 9/1-10/81) Haig's comments about the upcoming address were made within the context of a September 3 interview, of which the New York Times printed excerpts on September 5. ("Excerpts From Views Expressed by Haig," New York Times, September 5, 1981, page 4)

Haig began his September 13 address by emphasizing the importance of individual rights and the "balance between individual freedom and the common good." Noting that the "democratic revolution" served as the "best hope for human progress," he claimed that the Western democracies "have a unique privilege—and a compelling obligation—to promulgate their own revolutionary doctrine throughout the world." The democratic revolution, however, faced multiple challenges: "a loss of faith" that democracies could address issues of the 1980s; the application of double standards for international conduct; and the posing of "a false dichotomy" between social progress and security.

After discussing these challenges in detail, Haig returned to the question of Germany and its place within the future of the democratic revolution. Having begun his remarks by characterizing the construction of the Berlin Wall in 1961 as "dramatic evidence" of "one view of the human condition," he emphasized: "We have recently observed the 20th anniversary of the Berlin Wall and the 10th anniversary of the signing of the Quadripartite Agreement on Berlin. The progress achieved in the decade between these two events was made possible by Western determination to maintain the security and the freedom of the city, while at the same time seeking practical improvements in the lives of its inhabitants.

"The Quadripartite Agreement is a reminder of what East and West can achieve by negotiation. And it is a reminder to us that such success can only be achieved by Western perseverance and unity. The unity of the Western allies, the Federal Republic of Germany, and the Berliners themselves, has been one of the major reasons for the continued freedom and prosperity of Berlin over the past 35 years. Americans are proud of their role in maintaining the freedom of Berlin and in protecting stability in and around the city. Our commitment in Berlin remains one of the cornerstones of American engagement in Europe.

"It has been said before that free Berlin is an island of liberty in a sea of totalitarianism. Here there is a free press; on the other side of that hideous wall there is none. Here there is freedom of speech; a few kilometers away there is none. In free Berlin, you elect those who are to govern; in East Berlin elections are a mockery. And here Berliners are free to assemble and to demonstrate on behalf of their beliefs; East Berliners could not conceive of such liberty.

"It has not escaped my notice that my presence here today has brought into the streets West Berliners who think less well of me and my country than I would wish. In one sense I obviously regret those demonstrations. But in a far more important sense, we should all draw deep satisfaction from what they tell us about the strength of democracy and the commitment to democratic institutions in this part of Berlin. All the anguish, all the struggle, and all the determination of the allies, the Federal Republic of Germany, and West Berliners have expended over the years to keep this city free have been worth the price.

“Many years ago Voltaire, in speaking of another revolution, said, ‘I disagree with what you say, but I will defend to the death your right to say it.’ On behalf of my country—and on behalf of the several hundreds of thousands of my countrymen serving in our armed forces in Europe—let me close by saying that even when we disagree with what you say, we are prepared to defend to the death your right to say it.” (Department of State Bulletin, November 1981, pages 44–47)

Following his address, Haig took part in a question-and-answer session; for the text, see ibid., pages 47–49. During a news conference in Bonn on September 14, following his conversation with Genscher, Haig underscored that his visit to the Federal Republic of Germany “also afforded me an opportunity yesterday in West Berlin to underline unequivocally the unswerving and continuing support of the United States of America and of President Reagan’s Administration for the continued freedom, vitality, and well-being of the free city of West Berlin.” (Ibid., page 49)

Haig’s Speech on Western Values

Secretary Haig’s Berlin speech² was supposed to be a definitive statement of this Administration’s understanding of the common moral and political outlook that constitutes the West, and the centerpiece of our campaign to counter the propaganda of the international left. What we have been given instead is a poorly conceived and hastily written farrago of cliches which is unlikely to persuade anyone of anything.

The history of the Berlin speech as I understand it forms part of what is now a pattern: after protracted struggle within State (between the excellent speechwriters in S/P and the bureaus) a draft is prepared which is then almost wholly discarded by Harvey Sicherman, who proceeds to write his own version three or four days before the speech is to be given. The result is that there is no time for meaningful comment by other interested parties, but only for pro forma clearance. (I received Sicherman's draft of the Berlin speech exactly an hour and a half before comments were due.) This might be tolerable if Sicherman were terrific; he is not.

Apart from all this, though, the general thrust of the speech leaves much to be desired. It defines Western "values" almost wholly in terms of the freedom and "creativity" of the individual, with almost no attention to constitutionalism, the rule of law or human rights. Not only is such rhetoric vapid; it reflects the infiltration into American thought of relativist (ultimately Nietzschean) notions which are more supportive of the neo-left than of what this Administration is supposed to stand for. Particularly objectionable in my opinion is the virtual silence about human rights. This will not go unnoticed, and will only give fuel to the critics of Administration policy in this area. More generally, though, Sicherman's line is absolutely in error by the fact that it defines the West in terms of notions that are most peculiar to the West (and indeed to America) and least appealing to most of the world.

Given the poor quality of the speech, it is perhaps fortunate that press coverage of it was dominated by the toxin announcement as well as the local demonstrations. In any event, it is hardly an auspicious beginning to our ideological counteroffensive.³

On September 17, 1981, Secretary of State Alexander Haig testified before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee concerning the Ronald Reagan administration's view on U.S. strategic interests. Committee

Chair Senator Charles Percy (R–Illinois) opened the hearing, noting that Haig would “focus his remarks on the region encompassing the nations which lie between Morocco and Pakistan.” He then called on the ranking minority member of the Committee—Senator Claiborne Pell (D–Rhode Island)—to make an opening comment. Pell expressed his hope that Haig would also touch on the “overall course” of U.S. foreign policy, as Pell remained concerned that he saw the United States “increasingly on a collision course with the Soviet Union and not being deflected from that.”

Haig began his statement by indicating that his appearance marked “a welcome opportunity to review our progress in foreign policy,” noting that he would focus on the Middle East. After reviewing several administration accomplishments and reiterating the strategic components of the administration’s policy, Haig continued: “Nowhere is the maintenance of balance among the different elements of our foreign policy more important than in the Middle East, that complex and unstable region in which we have so many important economic, political, strategic, and even spiritual interests. Let me cite just a few of the developments that challenge the United States today:

“The oilfields in the Persian Gulf today, so vital to the United States and our European and Japanese allies, are threatened by the military presence of the Soviet Union and its proxies in Afghanistan, South Yemen, Ethiopia, and Libya;

“The new entente between Libya, Ethiopia, and South Yemen—three of the Soviets’ closest friends in the area—is only the most recent of many threats to the security of our friends in the region;

“The Arab-Israel dispute divides some of our closest friends;

“Iran, which once served as a buffer between the Soviet Union and the Gulf and helped to maintain regional security, is torn by war and violence. The danger to Iran’s independence and integrity poses a threat to U.S. security that would make Iran’s own wanton assault on international order pale by comparison;

“Ancient poverty and sudden wealth, venerable tradition and modern progress, coexist uneasily;

“American interests in the Middle East can be protected only by a strategy that neglects neither regional complexities nor the threat of external intervention. As I explained in April during my visits to Cairo, Jerusalem, Amman, and Riyadh, the United States regards the peace process and the effort to counter Soviet and regional threats as mutually reinforcing. If our friends are more secure, they will be more able to take risks for peace. If there is progress in the peace process, security cooperation will be facilitated—cooperation that is essential to deter intervention by the Soviets and their proxies.

"We support Israel and Egypt not only as security partners, but as partners in the historic peace process that they themselves began. In his discussions with Prime Minister Begin last week and in his earlier discussions with President Sadat, President Reagan made clear the U.S. interest in the peace process and our commitment to the Camp David accords. A participation of U.S. troops in a Sinai peacekeeping force is one measure of our determination to see peace succeed. Phil Habib's efforts as the President's personal emissary to defuse the crisis in Lebanon constitutes another. We are pleased that Egypt and Israel have agreed to resume the autonomy talks now scheduled to start in Egypt on September 23 and 24.

"We welcome the restraint that Israel has shown under difficult circumstances, making it possible for Ambassador Habib to negotiate a cessation of hostilities on the Israeli-Lebanon border. We welcome the good offices provided by Saudi Arabia that facilitated this task. We hope that violence on that front can be avoided. We look forward to rapid movement in the autonomy negotiations, and we shall work diligently to restore stability to Lebanon.

"However, even the most rapid possible progress on the Arab-Israeli dispute would not do away with the many other conflicts in the Middle East, such as the Iran-Iraq war, the tension between the two Yemens, or possible anarchy in Iran. And we would not have removed the threat of intervention by the Soviet Union or its proxies in these conflicts.

"Our ability to protect our friends from the insecurities that these conflicts produce will make them bolder in the peace process. It is also essential to protect vital U.S. interests.

"Although we are building up U.S. military capabilities so that we can better contribute to the security of the region, the use of U.S. military force can only be considered as a last resort. And to deter major Soviet threats for which the U.S. role is indispensable, we also need the help of our friends, both in the region and outside it whose interests are engaged by the threat to Middle East security.

"That is the reason why we are pursuing intensified strategic cooperation with Israel, Egypt, Saudi Arabia, and many other concerned countries. The form and content of our cooperation is different in each case. We are sensitive to both the political and military limitation on the contributions that different countries can usefully make. We are not seeking to construct formal alliances or a massive structure of U.S. bases. We are pursuing a sophisticated strategy, one guided as well by a deep sense of urgency.

“Our broad strategic view of the Middle East recognizes the intimate connections between that region and adjacent areas: Afghanistan and South Asia, Northern Africa, and the Horn, and the Mediterranean and the Indian Ocean. We recognize that an instability in Iran or other areas of the region can influence the prospects for peace between Israel and its neighbors.

“Success will, therefore, require a very broad effort. We are working with our European allies for a strong Turkey, not only to strengthen the security of NATO’s southern flank, but also because Turkey is a strategic bridge between Europe and Southwest Asia. We are assisting Tunisia, the Sudan, and others that are targets of Qadhafi’s expansionism. And our renewed cooperation with Pakistan reflects not only our concern over turmoil in Iran and aggression in Afghanistan, but our appreciation of the role a secure Pakistan can play in promoting regional stability.

“Our proposals to enhance the security of Saudi Arabia are a key element in our Middle East policy. The proposed arms sales will increase the Saudis’ ability to defend themselves against local threats. They will directly assist U.S. forces deployed in the region, just as U.S. AWACS do today, and they demonstrate our commitment to assist the Saudis against even greater dangers.

“Our friendship with Saudi Arabia is not based solely on its role as an oil supplier. Saudi Arabia is proving itself an essential partner in our broader interests. Saudi assistance has been important in the past to states that broke away from the Soviet embrace. Saudi Arabia has provided important assistance to moderate states such as Sudan and Pakistan, and, indeed, more will be required. It has played an essential diplomatic role in negotiating the recent cease-fire in Lebanon. It has played a key leadership role in the newly formed Gulf Cooperation Council. We expect Saudi cooperation in fostering peace and stability to broaden as the Saudis feel themselves more secure.

“Security cooperation is not a commodity to be sold or haggled over, it is a process that must be based on mutual confidence and mutual security interests. The question is whether the necessary basis of cooperation can survive if the seriousness of our commitment to Saudi Arabia’s security is compromised. To deny Saudi Arabia this basic means of self-defense is to deny it the sovereign status and respect essential to an enduring partnership.

“Some suggest that there can be no security cooperation as long as there are deep divisions on other issues. There is no question that we have differences with Saudi Arabia on the peace process, just as we have differences with Egypt and Israel on other issues. But American diplomacy in the Middle East has long been based on the need to work effectively with countries divided by deep differences.

“That is a difficult role to play; but it is the reason that the United States has played a uniquely positive role in the Middle East, a role that has not only served American interests but the interests of the moderate countries in the region and our European and Asian allies as well. It is an approach that emphasizes common concerns and seeks remedies to common problems.

“Our approach to Saudi Arabia has been shaped by the profound insecurity caused by events in the last 5 years, particularly the fall of the Shah. It has been influenced by discussions conducted by the previous administration with the Saudis and by previous U.S. actions, including the deployment of AWACS aircraft to Saudi Arabia during the Yemen crisis of 1979 and again during the Iran-Iraq war.

“Our approach has also been shaped, however, by an appreciation of Israeli concerns over the proposed Saudi package. We are taking steps to alleviate these concerns. We are determined to maintain the qualitative edge that is vital to Israel’s security. A stable regional balance, moreover, enhances deterrence against Soviet moves.

“Our discussions last week with Prime Minister Begin enhanced each side’s understanding of the other’s position on this and other issues. We are wholeheartedly and permanently committed to the security of Israel. Without a strong Israel, our hope to improve the prospects for peace and security in the region cannot be fulfilled. A secure Saudi Arabia and a strong United States-Saudi relationship are central to these same tasks.

“We must not let our friends’ worries about one another diminish our commitment to their security or hinder our plans to extend strategic cooperation with them. We are taking steps to assure that Israeli concerns are met, just as we are seeking to assure moderate Arab nations that our developing strategic cooperation with Israel is directed against Soviet intervention and not against the Arabs. But unless we are able to work effectively with all of our friends in the region, our security, the security of Israel, and peace itself will be endangered.

“Mr. Chairman, I could not overemphasize that last statement. Given the current dynamics of the peace process and the critical situation in Lebanon, these are what are at stake.” (Persian Gulf Situation: Hearing Before the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, Ninety-Seventh Congress, First Session, September 17, 1981, pages 1–6)

63. Address by Secretary of State Haig Before the United Nations General Assembly¹

New York, September 21, 1981

A New Era of Growth

The United Nations—this parliament of man—offers us a unique opportunity to examine the human condition. We are each called upon to declare our national purposes. And we are all obligated to address those problems that obstruct the vision of the charter.

Let us begin with the vision. The Charter of the United Nations reflects cherished dreams of a world distinguished by peaceful change and the resolution of international disputes without resort to force. The United States believes in these dreams. They offer the best chance of justice and progress for all mankind. They promise a world hospitable to the values of our own society including a certain idea of man as a creative and responsible individual; democracy; and the rule of law.

The ideals of the United Nations are, therefore, also American ideals. The charter embodies American principles. It will always be a major objective of our statecraft to make of the United Nations an instrument of peace.

We all know that the realization of our dreams cannot depend on hope alone. Obstacles to progress must be overcome through united efforts. The threats to peace are many, suspicions persist, and the price for inaction is great. Truly we face a difficult agenda.

As I make these comments, I am reminded that an observer once said of this annual debate: “Every year . . . a great and sacred orator . . . preaches before the assembly of nations a solemn sermon on the text of the charter.” Today, however, I would like to focus instead on an issue of compelling interest: international development.

International development reflects the worldwide search for economic progress, social justice, and human dignity. Short of war itself, no other issue before us will affect more people, for good or ill, than this search. And peace itself cannot be truly secured if the aspirations of mankind for a better life are frustrated.

Development is, therefore, an enduring issue. It has preoccupied the United Nations from the beginning. It will survive the agenda of this assembly and every assembly far into the future. And although great progress has been made, we face today a crucial choice of strategy that will dramatically affect the prospects for future success.

A Choice for the 1980s

Since the Second World War, the progress of development has been uneven but nonetheless widespread. Enormous economic growth has been registered. For example, in the last three decades, average incomes have actually doubled. There have also been great advances in health. Life expectancy has increased dramatically even in the poorest countries and infant mortality has been reduced.

This experience, however, has not been fully shared by all countries and the prospect for the future is now clouded by recent trends. The pattern of increasing economic growth, critical for development, has been slowed by inflation, high energy prices, severe balance-of-payments problems, heavy debt, and slower growth of markets. Political turmoil and instability have diverted precious resources into arms and conflict. The necessary synthesis between traditional values and modernization, never easy to achieve, has grown more difficult under the impact of accelerating change.

Let us dispense with illusions. We must choose today between two futures: a future of sustainable growth, an expansion of world trade, and a reduction of poverty or a future of economic stagnation, rising protectionism, and the spread of poverty. As the World Bank has put it: "By the end of the century, the difference between the two cases amounts to some 220 million more absolutely poor people."²

Clearly, our task is to give fresh impetus to development by devising now a new strategy for growth. Such a strategy begins by recognizing the highly complex and difficult situation we face.

- The poorest developing countries require long-term and generous concessional aid from developed and other developing countries to raise productivity through broadly based education and training, improvements in health and nutrition, and better infrastructure. They also need sound economic policies, particularly in the agricultural sector. Ultimately, the objective must be to involve them in the international economic system, thereby strengthening opportunities and incentives for self-sustaining growth.

- The middle tier of developing countries have made significant progress. Nevertheless, they still suffer from widespread poverty. They are also acutely vulnerable to any economic downturn—especially volatile commodity markets—because of their narrow range of exports.

² Reference is to World Development Report 1981 (Washington: World Bank, August 1981, p. 118).

These countries need foreign capital and assistance in developing the experience and credit worthiness to borrow on international capital markets. Technical support and manpower training are important to insure that their populations are productive and competitive. They also need an open international trading system to encourage export development.

- The more advanced of the developing countries are able to maintain living standards and economic performance comparable to what some of today's industrial countries achieved less than a generation ago. Their further development can be sustained best by a strong international economy with an open capital and trading system. They must be able to pursue national policies that take advantage of international opportunities and foster domestic adjustment. These countries also play a key role in helping poorer nations, both directly and as policy models.

- The capital-surplus, oil-exporting countries need a stable and prosperous international market for their oil exports and a favorable environment in which to invest their financial assets and to develop their domestic economies. The international system must continue to evolve to reflect the growing importance of these countries, as they assume increasing responsibility for the management of that system and for assisting poorer nations.

- Finally, the industrial countries are suffering from low rates of growth and high rates of inflation. They are trying to increase savings and investment in order to create employment, improve the environment, eliminate pockets of poverty, and adjust to the changing competitiveness of their exports. They must sell more abroad to pay for the increased cost of imported energy.

In a slowly growing world, these complex and diverse requirements would become potent sources of conflict. But the struggle for the world product can be avoided. The international economy can help all countries to achieve their objectives through a strategy of growth which creates the resources and the employment needed for progress. And this cannot be the task of any single nation.

As the report of the distinguished commission on international development issues, chaired by Willy Brandt, points out: "Above all, the achievement of economic growth in one country depends increasingly on the performance of others."³

³ Reference is to the Independent Commission on International Development Issues (ICIDI), chaired by former Chancellor of the Federal Republic of Germany Willy Brandt. The Brandt Commission Report, entitled North-South: A Programme for Survival, was released in 1980. See Foreign Relations, 1977–1980, vol. III, Foreign Economic Policy, Documents 345 and 351.

Principles for a Strategy of Growth

It is on this view of a differentiated and interdependent world that we must build a new strategy for growth. But our strategy must also be informed by the lessons of the past. Such lessons, extracted from hard experience, offer the basis for principles to guide us through these austere times.

First, development is facilitated by an open international trading system. Developed and developing countries together face the challenge of strengthening the GATT (General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade) and international trading system to create mutual export opportunities.

Today the trading system is under enormous stress—rising protectionist pressures, new and subtle types of import barriers, restrictive bilateral arrangements, export subsidies and investment policies which distort trade. These are especially troublesome in a period of slow growth. Unless they are reduced or eliminated, the international trading system will be seriously weakened. Such a setback to the world economy would inflict the most suffering on the developing countries.

The industrialized countries have a special responsibility to work for a more open trading system with improved rules. We also look to the more successful developing countries to play a fuller role in strengthening the trading system. It will be difficult for each of our countries individually to open markets further unless we are committed to doing so collectively.

For our part, the United States has long supported open markets. Despite current complications, America remains a strong advocate of free trade. Although our gross national product is only one-third of the Western industrialized group's total, the United States imports roughly one-half of all manufactured goods exported by developing countries. Earnings of non-OPEC developing countries from exports to the United States amount to $60 billion—more than double the foreign aid coming from all Western developed countries.

We call upon all members of the international community to join in resisting growth in protectionism. Developing nations must have the greatest possible opportunity to sell their commodities and manufactured product. Let us also work together to achieve a successful conclusion of the multifiber agreement.

A dynamic and successful trading system requires a smoothly functioning international financial system. We must, therefore, continue to work with other countries to encourage their support for the International Monetary Fund and their constructive participation in the Fund's programs to facilitate adjustment. We will continue to cooperate with our developing country colleagues to strengthen the Fund. We share the view that the responsibilities of developing countries should be increased to keep pace with their growing economic importance.

Second, foreign assistance coupled with sound domestic policy and self-help can facilitate the development process. The United States has long believed in assistance as an effective tool in helping to promote development. Over the last three decades the United States has given more than $130 billion in concessional assistance. Over the last decade alone, the total has exceeded $50 billion. In 1980, the American people provided $7.1 billion, almost twice as much as any other donor.

The United States has also been the major force in the creation and support of the multilateral development banks. The banks represent an important, and to many countries essential, feature in the international financial system. In the last 5 years, the United States has authorized and appropriated an average of $1.5 billion per year for support of the multilateral banks. There is no question about their value as development institutions. As intermediaries they help to mobilize the resources of international capital markets to lend to developing countries. The banks' loans for key projects are important catalysts for productive domestic and foreign private investment.

We recognize that many of the poorer developing countries must continue to rely heavily on concessional assistance for some time to come. Moreover, certain kinds of vital development programs will not pay the quick and direct financial returns needed to attract private capital. For this reason, a continuing bilateral assistance program and continuing support for the multilateral banks will be essential.

Given today's economic conditions and the limitation on aid budgets in many countries, it is especially important that concessional assistance be utilized as effectively as possible; that it focus on countries which need it most and use it best; and that it be a more effective catalyst for mobilizing other foreign and domestic resources. We must also recognize that a strategy for growth that depends on a massive increase in the transfer of resources from developed to developing countries is simply unrealistic.

Third, regional cooperation and bilateral consultations can be effective in promoting development. The United States is working with other regional states to promote economic progress in the Caribbean area.⁴ We are convinced that the example of the recent multinational cooperation in the case of Jamaica and the broader Caribbean Basin initiative holds promise for other regions.⁵

We are already committed to a close working relationship with ASEAN [Association of Southeast Asian Nations]. We have benefited considerably from a better understanding of ASEAN's views on multi-lateral issues and ways to strengthen our bilateral commercial ties. The U.S.-ASEAN Business Council is a model of how our private sectors can work together for mutual benefit.

In Africa we look forward to a close working relationship with the Economic Community of West African States, as it attempts to strengthen economic ties within the region. Constructive consultations on trade and investment issues have already occurred. We believe that mutually beneficial cooperation can be strengthened to our common benefit. Similar consultations with the developing countries of southern Africa are desirable. We have a strong interest in the economic health and stability of these nations. Commercial relationships along with foreign assistance will help us to attain that objective.

The United States has also worked with the capital-surplus members of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries on both a bilateral and multilateral basis. We have been able to combine resources to attack development problems of common interest, such as food production. This cooperation should be continued and expanded.

Finally, we plan to make bilateral consultative groups between our government and those of developing countries more effective and to give full support to similar private sector arrangements. The U.S. Chamber of Commerce and its counterparts in many developing countries have developed particularly good relationships. We fully support these efforts and those of the private voluntary agencies; we are searching for means to work more closely with them.

In all of these cases, the United States recognizes the need to be sensitive to the diverse character of the societies involved and to the international circumstances in which development must occur.

⁵ It is unclear as to Haig's reference to Jamaica. Presumable references are to the March decision of eight international banks to establish a $70 million credit to the Government of Jamaica and the IMF's decision to approve a $640 million loan for Jamaica. (Robert A. Bennett, "8 Major Banks Agree On Jamaica Credit Program," New York Times, March 31, 1981, p. D1, and "I.M.F. Jamaica Loan," New York Times, April 15, 1981, p. D6) In his remarks made en route to Cancun on July 31 (see footnote 3, Document 59), Haig referenced multilateral cooperation regarding Jamaica, stating: "Take for example the pilot program that has been developed for Jamaica, which is broadly based and involves investment—the private sector. It involves multinational participation in the critical country which is both regional and worldwide in context." (Department of State Bulletin, September 1981, p. 33)

Fourth, growth for development is best achieved through reliance on incentives for individual economic performance. The individual is the beginning, the key element, and the ultimate beneficiary of the development process. The greatest potential for development lies in the hard work and ingenuity of the farmer, the worker, and the entrepreneur. They need incentives to produce and the opportunity to benefit from their labors.

Suppression of economic incentives ultimately suppresses enthusiasm and invention. And the denial of personal freedom can be as great an obstacle to productivity as the denial of reward for achievement. History cautions against regimes that regiment their people in the name of ideals yet fail to achieve either economic or social progress. Those governments that have been more solicitous of the liberties of their people have also been more successful in securing both freedom and prosperity.

The United States can offer what it knows best from its own experience. We have seen that policies which encourage private initiatives will promote better resource allocation and more rapid economic growth. Within a framework basically hospitable to market incentives, foreign private investment can supplement indigenous investment and contribute significantly to development.

But our goal is not to impose either our economic values or our judgments on anyone. In the final analysis, each country's path to development will be shaped by its own history, philosophy, and interests.

Fifth, development requires a certain measure of security and political stability. Political insecurity is a major barrier to development. Fear and uncertainty stifle the productivity of the individual. Scarce resources are squandered in conflict. The close relationship between security and development cannot be ignored. We are, therefore, committed to maintain and, where possible, to increase programs essential to deter international aggression and to provide the domestic security necessary to carry out sound economic policies. We have no intention of providing foreign assistance, moral comfort, or the prestige of international political platforms to countries that foster international violence.

The United Nations has a key role to play in resolving conflict and promoting international stability. We welcome the Secretary General's effort to promote intercommunal talks and a just settlement on Cyprus.⁶ We support a continuing role by the Secretary General's representative in the Iraq-Iran conflict.⁷ And South Korea's attempt to initiate a dialogue with the north epitomizes the search for peaceful settlement that is the heart of the charter.

⁷ Palme served as UN Special Representative to Iran and Iraq from 1979 until 1982.

One of the greatest dangers to the charter today and to development itself is the willful violation of the national integrity of both Afghanistan and Kampuchea by the Soviet Union and Vietnam. Their behavior challenges the basic rights of all sovereign states. The world's hopes for peace, for security, and for development will be jeopardized if "might makes right" becomes the law of nations.

The United States will continue to support security and stability as essential to progress. This is the basis of our active and continuing efforts to strengthen and expand the cease-fire in southern Lebanon.⁸ We shall also assist the negotiations specified by Resolutions 242 and 338 in order to bring a just and lasting peace to the Middle East.⁹ Our policy is to remain a credible and reliable party in the negotiations to bring independence to Namibia on the basis of U.N. Resolution 435¹⁰ and in a fashion acceptable to both the nations concerned and the international community.

The United States also believes that efforts to control arms, either among regional states or between the superpowers, can make an important contribution to the security that facilitates development. But these efforts do not occur in a vacuum. The international community has tended to overestimate the beneficial effects of the Strategic Arms Limitation Talks in dampening regional conflict. We have also tended to underestimate the impact of such conflict on the negotiations themselves.

The United States is strongly committed to balanced and verifiable arms control. We are equally committed to the peaceful resolution of regional disputes. Clearly, the restraint implied by arms control must become a more widespread phenomenon if such agreements are to survive and to make their proper contribution to a more secure environment for development.

In Pursuit of Growth

The United States is confident that a strategy for growth guided by these principles can succeed. We believe that three areas of action deserve immediate international attention.

First, a global expansion of trade. Plans could be formulated for the 1982 GATT ministerial with the special concerns of growth in mind.¹¹

⁸ See footnote 6, Document 53.

¹⁰ UN Security Council Resolution 435 (S/RES/435), adopted on September 29, 1978, reaffirmed the United Nation's legal authority over Namibia.

A major priority should be to integrate more fully the developing countries into the international trading system on the basis of shared responsibilities and benefits.

Second, an increase in investment. Our common objective should be to stimulate domestic and international private investment. We must encourage and support the individual investor.

Third, stronger international cooperation in food and energy. The recent U.N. Conference on New and Renewable Sources of Energy recommended that the developing countries be assisted in assessing their energy resources and determining the best way to exploit them.¹² The U.N. Development Program and the World Bank have important followup responsibilities. And we must all work to engage more effectively private participation in exploration and production in oil-importing developing nations.

Domestic and international action must also go hand in hand to achieve food security. The United States continues to be the largest donor of food aid and places a paramount emphasis on its bilateral program to help developing countries increase food production. Greater attention should be given to scientific and technological research that will yield more bountiful food supplies.

I have outlined today the broad principles that guide America's approach to new strategy for growth. In the immediate future, and prior to the Cancun summit,¹³ we will announce specific proposals to deal with this and other issues of development.

Dialogue for the Future

These broad principles reflect our view that the United States can and will continue to make an essential contribution to the process of development. We do not claim to have all of the answers. But we do believe that our collective responsibilities for the future allow no more time to be lost in sterile debates and unrealistic demands. The time has come for a reasoned dialogue with promise for the future.

¹² In A/RES/33/148, "United Nations Conference on New and Renewable Sources of Energy," adopted by the UN General Assembly on December 20, 1978, the United Nations called for a conference to analyze the effectiveness and feasibility of ten new and renewable energy sources. The UNCNRSE took place in Nairobi, August 10–21, 1981. Special Representative to the President Stanton Anderson headed the U.S. delegation to the conference and addressed the delegates on August 13. For the text of his address, see Department of State Bulletin, January 1982, pp. 63–66. On August 21, conference delegates adopted a program of action, known as the Nairobi Plan of Action. For the plan, consisting of an introduction and three chapters, see *Report on the U.N. Conference on New and Renewable Sources of Energy, Nairobi, August 10–21, 1981, U.N. The search for economic progress, social justice, and human dignity has always been supported by the American people, themselves an example of successful development. Our initiatives and resources, through bilateral programs, the United Nations and other multilateral agencies, have made major contributions to the process of modernization throughout the world. For the United States, support of development constitutes a practical imperative.

At the Ottawa summit the United States reaffirmed its willingness to join its partners in exploring all avenues of consultation and cooperation with developing countries. In October, President Reagan will go to the summit meeting in Cancun, Mexico. He looks forward to a genuine and open exchange of views on questions of economic development and international cooperation. The Cancun summit offers a novel opportunity to gain fresh understanding of the problems we face together. The United States will join in a constructive and cooperative spirit.

Our objective is to bring about a new era of growth. But the purpose of both growth and development goes beyond materialism. As Winston Churchill said: "Human beings and human societies are not structures that are built, or machines that are forged. They are plants that grow and must be treated as such."

Despite the difficulties of the moment, we should go forward in a spirit of optimism. We have the vision bequeathed to us by the charter. We have the potential of the peoples represented in this room. Let us go forward together to achieve a new era of growth for all mankind.

Western Political Offensive

Our strategy for a Western Political Offensive is off to a good start. We are getting the "critical mass" in September which we planned several months ago. With your speeches in Berlin,² and at the UNGA,³ and the President's letter to Brezhnev,⁴ we have taken the high ground for the first time in years. Gromyko's speech was an unplanned but positive dividend.⁵ We are beginning to create favorable international conditions rather than simply reacting to events.

As you know, these are only the first events in our plan. We have many more initiatives for the coming weeks and months.

I. Security Dimension

—Secretary Weinberger's report on the Soviet military threat will be released on September 29th.⁶ This is the beginning of a major informational campaign to educate Western publics on the military threat.

—The other unclassified materials we will be giving to the Europeans early in October include: a good JCS paper on the East-West military balance; a set of CIA graphics on TNF and other systems; a paper relating nuclear deterrence to peace; and a TNF threat assessment.⁷

—All of this is leading up to the release of a NATO White Paper on the military balance at the December Ministerial. We're beginning to look beyond December to the May Ministerial/Summit to devise ways to focus public attention on and generate support for specific alliance military needs.

—I'm also planning a major speech in Europe in October on the fundamental elements of Alliance security; to complement your Berlin speech on values.⁸

II. Soviet Covert Action and Reciprocity

—Timed to undermine the Oct. 10th demonstrations in Bonn, on October 7th we will be releasing to the press a major unclassified report on Soviet "active measures"

—disinformation, covert actions, propaganda, manipulation of Europeans on ERW, TNF, etc. We have encouraged the Allies to make public information of their own. We are placing stories on this in European papers. And we are hoping to surface in Europe for the press a former KGB specialist in “active measures”. The British are giving the Scandinavians a similar paper on Soviet efforts in that area and we’re trying to get it published.

—On October 23 experts are meeting in NATO to elaborate further steps to expose Soviet covert action, to discuss reciprocity initiatives, and prepare a report for the December Ministerial.⁹

III. North-South

—We must ensure that the President goes ahead with a speech on October 14 laying out the specific proposals on North-South policy deleted from your speech—most importantly our proposal for an international Conference on Growth.¹⁰ This will be a major sequel to your Berlin (political Idea) speech and UNGA address. We should go further with our economic “Idea” offensive: the key element here will be to stress the necessity of eliminating the internal and external barriers to growth. A new era of growth can come from private initiatives and incentives, upward mobility, freer trade, investment. This will subtly move the focus of development strategy from solely redistributionist solutions.

—The Cancun Summit where the President can keep on the offensive with the growth idea.

IV. Values and Soviet Aggression in Third World

—We need additional speeches by you and the President on Western values and institutions as the wave of the future to rival Marxist historical view so prevalent in Europe and Third World. Since the real thrust of our offensive is based on the conceptual framework defined by these values, such speeches (each with a slightly different focus) should remain a constant item on our agenda. They will continually remind our publics that we have values worth defending, show the world the superiority of our political order, and add the moral force that is essential to the credibility and strength of our deterrent. The Presidential trip to Europe next May-June which you have recommended, perhaps emphasizing the 35th anniversary of the Marshall Plan will provide a good forum for such speeches.

—We could give Western policies and publics a real boost by holding an Afghanistan and Freedom Day in the U.S., Europe and the Islamic countries. This could be done Saturday, May 15th—just before the President arrived in Europe. This could be a major exercise in mass politics—a field in which partisans of freedom and democracy have been seriously deficient. It's impact would go far beyond Afghanistan to help create the right climate for defense spending, attention to other Soviet/proxy aggressions, etc. (see attached)

In sum, we have a number of initiatives underway to sustain momentum in our offensive. We will have further ideas to propose to you in the months ahead.

A STRATEGY FOR AFGHANISTAN DAY

Afghanistan Day is to be a major international expression of public outrage against the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan and moral support for the struggle of the Afghan freedom fighters. It is to be a day of many events that will attract the participation and attention of millions of people world-wide. Most important it has implications and utility going well beyond the Afghan issue.

We set forth here: 1) what it would achieve; 2) what would happen on such a day; and 3) what needs to be done to organize it.

Why Afghanistan Day is Important

—It is a much needed expression of mass public opposition to Soviet aggression, countering and offsetting recent and upcoming public demonstrations in Europe and elsewhere which are basically anti-American.

—It will help create the right climate for other issues: defense spending, opposition to Soviet/proxy activities elsewhere, etc. At the same time, Afghanistan itself is the only example of Soviet aggression about which there is sufficient consensus to organize such a day.

—It will coopt large portions of the Left in Europe, America and elsewhere. The honest Left will be compelled to support it. Those members of the Left who profess adherence to freedom who fail to support it will expose themselves as dishonest and pursuing a double standard.

—It will be an essential element in our overall policy of reciprocity toward the USSR. Soviet propaganda and front organizations conduct similar massive public demonstrations against the U.S. It is time we responded in kind.

—Some will object that the exercise will be useless and will fail to force the Soviets out of Afghanistan, because the Kremlin is not subject to the same public pressure as are democratic societies. These objections miss the point. The Soviets can be deterred from further aggression and dissuaded from continuing the same levels of aggression in Afghanistan if they see that their actions are presenting them with political defeat and growing public support for defense spending and other concrete measures of opposition to Soviet aggression.

—Most important, such a day would be much needed tonic for the West. It would be a massive celebration of freedom and opposition to repression. It would unite the American people, Europeans and others and do so behind the basic foreign policy thrust of this Administration.

The Agenda for "Afghanistan Day"

Afghanistan Day should be observed in as many countries as possible. Most importantly, it should be observed in Europe and America, so as to strengthen the defense of the West. It would be highly desirable to see it observed all over the Third World—and especially in the Islamic world. It should involve the following elements and more:

—Parades, concerts, theatrical events, symposia and academic conferences.

—Corporate participation through funding of events and placing advertisements in newspapers and TV.

—Op-ed articles, truth squads, Afghanistan information offices, church sermons, petitions, Congressional resolutions, etc.

—TV specials: e.g., three-hour special covering the day's events, President's speech, concerts and films on Afghanistan.

How Afghanistan Day Will be Organized

Afghanistan Day will be a massive organizational challenge. It will require the cooperation of many countries and of many groups within each country.

—The first step is to secure President Reagan's support. We will draft a memo from Secretary Haig to the President for this purpose with interagency input and clearances.

—Then we must get a private group in another country to take the public lead. We think an all-party group in the FRG could be formed for this purpose. Several members of the Bundestag suggested this approach and are willing to do it. Only after the Germans have visibly launched their organizing effort will we begin to do anything.

—Then we need to get organized 1) within the USG; 2) within the US, including the Congress and private groups; and 3) internationally.

—The national organizing committees would then “seek” the cooperation of their national governments in this effort. Appearances here must be that this is a collective private effort initiated in Europe and outside of the government. Hence, the American organizing committee would “approach” the President and request his support of the effort.

—The focus of the effort must be more on the problem of the Soviet invasion than on the solutions, which may be divisive.

SUBJECT

A Strategy for Cancun

We need a carefully constructed strategy to achieve US objectives at Cancun. A number of countries are already working in informal caucuses (France, Mexico, India and Sweden) to gain their objectives which are not necessarily ours.

The US has multiple objectives to achieve at Cancun.

1. To use the Summit to develop personal relationships between you and other heads of state or government that can be useful in achieving bilateral and regional objectives;

2. To emphasize that the US is sensitive to the economic development problems and concerns of the developing countries, that it has a

¹Source: Reagan Library, Edwin Meese Files, Cabinet and Cabinet Councils Material, Cabinet Matters Files, Cancun Summit Meeting 10/21/1981–10/23/1981—Preparation Materials [2 of 7]. Secret. Also scheduled for publication in Foreign Relations 1981–1988, vol. XXXVIII, International Economic Development; International Debt; Foreign Assistance. On October 5, the President, Haig, Meese, Baker, Deaver, Anderson, Kirkpatrick, Brock, Darman, Fuller, Bush, Allen, Nau, Tyson, and Gergen met in the Cabinet Room from 3:19 until 4:34 p.m. to discuss the Cancun summit. (Reagan Library, President’s Daily Diary) According to Gergen’s handwritten notes of the meeting, Haig stated: “Need finite decision today for bureaucracy to move fwd re Cancun. There are some legitimate differences between depts. 5 initiatives have been developed at the departmental level. Each one alone subj. to criticism but together, very positive. USSR & Cuba have alienated 3rd world. The 3rd world is up for grabs. Should seize the initiative. —If we do less, will leave us in tepid waters. Will isolate us w/3rd world & Europeans will side w/3rd world.” (Reagan Library, David Gergen Files, Subject File, Cancun—[Summit]) positive record of support and that it is committed to further efforts by itself and in concert with others.

3. To demonstrate that we have a positive, substantive program for addressing the problems of the developing nations—one which integrates foreign assistance, trade, investment, and technical assistance;

4. To explain our foreign economic policy toward developing countries and launch, if possible, a cooperative international effort toward a “new era of growth;”

5. To arrive at a satisfactory solution to the issue of Global Negotiations,² including a follow-on consultative process if necessary; and

6. To reinforce our bilateral relationship with Mexico by contributing to Lopez Portillo’s prestige³ and having the conference end successfully.

A majority of the countries attending Cancun views it as an opportunity to apply political leverage to the more conservative countries (UK, FRG, Japan and Saudi Arabia) but especially to the US. They want the US:

a) To accept a commitment to assist in the economic development of the developing world through concessional assistance, technical help, and support for their objective of increasing exports and investment, without an overlay of East/West over North/South;

b) To accept a commitment to negotiations in the political framework of the UN (i.e. Global Negotiations),

c) To accept a commitment for immediate help on the pressing problems of financing energy production and imports, providing adequate food security, and increasing assistance to the very poor countries who participate only marginally in the world economy.

The objectives of the majority can best be achieved in multilateral political meetings. The US objectives are best achieved in the multilateral functional organizations (GATT, IMF, World Bank), regionally, and bilaterally. We therefore need a strategy that emphasizes multilateral functional, regional, and bilateral contacts over multilateral political participation.

² In A/RES/34/138, “Global Negotiations Relating to International Economic Co-Operation for Development,” adopted by the UN General Assembly on December 14, 1979, the United Nations endorsed the initiation of Global Negotiations on development and international economic relations to take place during its 1980 special session. For additional information, see Yearbook of the United Nations, 1979, p. 465. Documentation on the negotiations is also printed in Foreign Relations, 1977–1980, vol. III, Foreign Economic Policy, Documents 338, 344, and 348–350.

³ Reference is to Lopez Portillo’s role as chair of the summit meeting.

A Bilateral Strategy

While the plenary meeting will be at center stage at Cancun and your statements there will be the major element of your presentation, the bilateral meetings will enable you to carry the US position and your commitment to development cooperation in a more personal manner. Given time limitations, you will need to focus your time on the participants from developing countries. I suggest you see all developing country heads of state or government for at least a courtesy meeting. You can spend more time with key developing countries (China, India, Tanzania, Algeria, and Nigeria) for discussion of bilateral and multilateral issues. These key countries should be seen first on Wednesday, October 21, to stress, bilaterally, our key multilateral objectives.

The US will attempt to hold the multilateral aspects of the meeting within the agreed procedures of the August 1–2 preparatory meeting; An open and informal meeting with no agenda and no communique.⁴ A summary of the conference will be provided by the co-chairmen, on their own responsibility, soon after its close on October 23.⁵

A Press Strategy

The press will be frozen out of the conference hotel, and all contacts must be made elsewhere. We are setting up an American press center. There will be little coverage of the multilateral meeting until the final press conference by Lopez Portillo and Kreisky. The press will be hungry. We plan to arrange some way for the bilaterals to be covered by press and photographers so a constant stream of US meetings is the news from Cancun. Secondly, frequent press briefings by US spokesmen on the multilateral meeting should follow the pattern established in Ottawa.⁶

Your Speech on or About October 14

This speech should put you in a forward posture, advocating a positive and specific program and seeking international cooperation.⁷ It should contain specific elements and your substantive approach, since you will not have the time to spell this out at Cancun.

The speech should be oriented toward a domestic audience and stress US interests (economic, political and humanitarian) in developing countries. It should explain the link between domestic economic recovery and a healthy world economy. (One in eight jobs is tied to US exports; the product from one in every three acres harvested is sold abroad.) You are, therefore, going to Cancun to establish the basis of a “new era of growth” for the mutual benefit of all countries. Key to this program in the US view are open trade, increased investment flows, access to energy, and adequate food supplies. Concessional aid will be important for the poorest countries and for projects which cannot be financed by the private sector.

Your speech to the IMF/IBRD annual meetings,⁸ Don Regan’s speech to the same group,⁹ and my presentation to the UNGA lay out our general policy.¹⁰ The October 14 speech would put flesh on these bones and explains to the public why you are committing your time to the Cancun meeting.

Statement for the Opening Session at Cancun

Timing of the statement will be important.¹¹ This can be arranged with the Mexicans and Austrians. The statement will be the keynote off of which others will respond. I would suggest that you speak in third or fourth position, after the Mexican introductory statement.

The statement should express our sensitivity to LDC problems, explain our record, and lay out our policy, including the desire to establish a new “era of growth.” This new era must be built on certain basic elements (trade, investment, energy, food, and concessional assistance to the poorer nations). Our initiative package is tied to these basic elements (see attachment).¹²

The statement should also contain our first public word on the issue of Global Negotiations. I don’t believe an earlier announcement of our position would be useful. We will not satisfy everyone, and an early disclosure of the position will just set us up for criticism.¹³

Philadelphia, October 15, 1981

Remarks at a Luncheon of the World Affairs Council of Philadelphia in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania

Drew Lewis, thank you very much for an introduction that—I couldn't have written it for myself, but—[laughter]—thank you. Governor Thornburgh, Mayor Green, Mr. Chairman,² the distinguished guests here on the dais and you, ladies and gentlemen:

All in all, I really rather would be in Philadelphia.

I'm grateful for this opportunity to appear before your distinguished group and to share with you our administration's views on an important, upcoming event. I'll be traveling next week to Cancún, Mexico, to participate in a summit³ that will bring together leaders of two-thirds of the world's population. And the subject of our talks will be the relationships among the developed and the developing nations and, specifically, I hope we can work together to strengthen the world economy and to promote greater economic growth and prosperity for all our peoples.

U.S. foreign policy proceeds from two important premises: the need to revitalize the United States and world economy as a basis for the social and economic progress of our own and other nations, and the need to provide adequate defenses to remain strong, safe, in a precarious period of world history. In this context, U.S. relations with developing countries play a critical role. These countries are important partners in the world economy and in the quest for world peace.

We understand and are sensitive to the diversity of developing countries. Each is unique in its blend of cultural, historical, economic, and political characteristics, but all aspire to build a brighter future. And they can count on our strong support.

We will go to Cancún ready and willing to listen and to learn. We will also take with us sound and constructive ideas designed to help spark a cooperative strategy for global growth to benefit both the developed and developing countries.

Such a strategy rests upon three solid pillars:

—First, an understanding of the real meaning of development, based on our own historical experience and that of other successful countries;

—Second, a demonstrated record of achievement in promoting growth and development throughout the world, both through our bilateral economic relations and through the concentration—or cooperation with our partners in the specialized international institutions, such as the World Bank, the International Monetary Fund;

—And third, practical proposals for cooperative actions in trade, investment, energy, agriculture, and foreign assistance, that can contribute to a new era of prosperity and abundance exceeding anything we may dream possible today.

We very much want a positive development dialog, but sometimes this dialog becomes oversimplified and unproductive. For example, some people equate development with commerce, which they unfairly characterize as simple lust for material wealth. Others mistake compassion for development and claim massive transfers of wealth somehow miraculously will produce new well-being. And still others confuse development with collectivism, seeing it as a plan to fulfill social, religious, or national goals, no matter what the cost to individuals or historical traditions.

All of these definitions miss the real essence of development. In its most fundamental sense, it has to do with the meaning, aspirations, and worth of every individual. In its ultimate form, development is human fulfillment, an ability by all men and women to realize freely their full potential to go as far as their God-given talents will take them.

We Americans can speak from experience on this subject. When the original settlers arrived here, they faced a wilderness where poverty was their daily lot, danger and starvation their close companions. But through all the dangers, disappointments, and setbacks, they kept their faith. They never stopped believing that with the freedom to try and try again, they could make tomorrow a better day.

[Referring to demonstrators shouting in the background] You know, I spoke here in 1975⁴ and there wasn't an echo. [Laughter]

In 1630, John Winthrop predicted that we would be a city upon a hill with the eyes of all people upon us. By 1836, Alexis de Tocqueville was calling America "a land of wonders," where every change seems like an improvement, and what man has not yet done was simply what he hadn't yet attempted to do.⁵ And in 1937, Walter Lippmann could draw the lesson that America, for the first time in history, gave men "a way of producing wealth in which the good fortune of others multiplied their own."⁶

Free people build free markets that ignite dynamic development for everyone. And that's the key, but that's not all. Something else helped us create these unparalleled opportunities for growth and personal fulfillment: a strong sense of cooperation, free association among individuals, rooted in institutions of family, church, school, press, and voluntary groups of every kind. Government, too, played an important role. It helped eradicate slavery and other forms of discrimination. It opened up the frontier through actions like the Homestead Act⁷ and rural electrification. And it helped provide a sense of security for those who, through no fault of their own, could not support themselves.

Government and private enterprise complement each other. They have, they can, and they must continue to coexist and cooperate. But we must always ask: Is government working to liberate and empower the individual? Is it creating incentives for people to produce, save, invest, and profit from legitimate risks and honest toil? Is it encouraging all of us to reach for the stars? Or does it seek to compel, command, and coerce people into submission and dependence?

Ask these questions, because no matter where you look today, you will see that development depends upon economic freedom. A mere handful of industrialized countries that have historically coupled personal initiative with economic reward now produce more than one-half the wealth of the world. The developing countries now growing the fastest in Asia, Africa, and Latin America are the very ones providing more economic freedom for their people—freedom to choose, to own property, to work at a job of their choice, and to invest in a dream for the future.

Perhaps the best proof that development and economic freedom go hand-in-hand can be found in a country which denies freedom to its people—the Soviet Union. For the record, the Soviets will not attend the conference at Cancún. They simply wash their hands of any responsibility, insisting all the economic problems of the world result from capitalism, and all the solutions lie with socialism.

Well, the real reason they're not coming is they have nothing to offer. In fact, we have just one question for them: Who's feeding whom? I can hardly remember a year when Soviet harvests have not been blamed on "bad weather," and I've seen a lot of harvest seasons, as the press keeps reminding me. [Laughter] They've had quite a long losing streak for a government which still insists the tides of history are running in its favor.

The Soviets, of course, can rely on farmers from America and other nations to keep their people fed. But ironically, they have a reliable source of nourishment right in their own country—the 3 percent of all cultivated land that farmers in the Soviet Union are allowed to farm on their own and market. Those who farm that 3 percent of land produce nearly 30 percent of the meat, milk, and vegetables in Russia, 33 percent of the eggs, and 61 percent of the potatoes.

Now, that's why this isn't a question of East versus West, of the U.S. versus the Soviet Union. It's a question of freedom versus compulsion, of what works versus what doesn't work, of sense versus nonsense. And that's why we say: Trust the people, trust their intelligence and trust their faith, because putting people first is the secret of economic success everywhere in the world.

Now I want to talk about the second part of our message at Cancún—our record and that of the international economic system itself in helping developing countries generate new growth and prosperity. Here again, it's time to speak out with candor. To listen to some shrill voices, you'd think our policies were as stingy as your Philadelphia Eagles' defense. [Laughter] There is a propaganda campaign in wide circulation that would have the world believe that capitalist United States is the cause of world hunger and poverty.

And yet each year, the United States provides more food assistance to developing nations than all the other nations combined. Last year, we extended almost twice as much official development assistance as any other nation.

The spirit of voluntary giving is a wonderful tradition that flows like a deep, mighty river through the history of our Nation. When Americans see people in other lands suffering in poverty and starvation, they don't wait for government to tell them what to do. They sit down and give and get involved; they save lives. And that's one reason we know America is such a special country.

All that is just one side of the coin. The other, only rarely acknowledged, is the enormous contribution we make through the open, growing markets of our own country. The United States buys approximately one-half of all the manufactured goods that non-OPEC developing countries export to the industrialized world, even though our market is only one-third of the size of the total industrialized world's. Last year, these same developing countries earned twice as much from exports to the United States than they received in aid from all other countries combined. And in the last 2 years alone, they earned more from exports to the United States than the entire developing world has received from the World Bank in the last 36 years.

Even as we work to strengthen the World Bank and other international institutions, let us recognize, then, the enormous contribution of American trade to development.

The barriers to trade in our markets are among the lowest in the world. The United States maintains few restrictions on our custom procedures, and they are very predictable. In 1980, 51 percent of our imports from developing countries entered this country duty free. American capital markets are also more accessible to the developing countries than capital markets anywhere else in the world.

From all this, two conclusions should be clear: Far from lagging behind and refusing to do our part, the United States is leading the way in helping to better the lives of citizens in developing countries. And a major way that we can do that job best, the way we can provide the most opportunity for even the poorest of nations, is to follow through with our own economic recovery program to ensure strong, sustained noninflationary growth. And that's just what we're determined to do.

Every 1 percent reduction in our interest rates, due to lower inflation, improves the balance of payments of developing countries by $1 billion. By getting our own economic house in order, we win, they win, we all win.

Now, just as there is need for a clearer focus on the real meaning of development and our own development record, there's a similar need to be clear about the international economic system. Some argue that the system has failed; others that it's unrepresentative and unfair. Still others say it is static and unchanging, and then a few insist that it's so sound it needs no improvement. Well, we need a better understanding than that.

As I recalled recently before the annual meeting of the World Bank and the IMF, the post-war international economic system was created on the belief that “the key to national development and human progress is individual freedom—both political and economic.”⁸ This system provided only generalized rules in order to maintain maximum flexibility and opportunity for individual enterprise and an open international trading and financial system.

The GATT, the World Bank, the International Monetary Fund represent free associations of independent countries who accept both the freedom and discipline of a competitive economic system. Let’s look at the record of international growth and development under their auspices.

From 1950 to 1980, gross national product, per capita, in 60 middle-income countries increased twice as fast as in the industrial countries when real purchasing power is taken into account. In 1951 to 1979, industry and manufacturing in developing countries also expanded at a faster rate than their counterparts in the industrial countries. Since 1960, export volume for the developing countries, excluding OPEC, grew between 6 and 7 percent a year. Growth was particularly strong in manufactured exports, and even some low-income oil importers participated in this trend. And, concessional assistance grew by 50 percent in real items during the 1970’s.

By any standard, this is a remarkable record. It’s not a basis for complacency, however. We recognize that despite the progress, many developing nations continue to struggle with poverty, minorities, and the lack of infrastructure, and are seriously affected by disruption in the international economy.

But while much progress remains to be made, we can take pride in what has been accomplished—pride in the efforts of those countries that did most to utilize effectively the opportunities of the system and pride in the system itself for being sufficiently flexible to ensure that the benefits of international commerce flow increasingly to all countries.

Progress is also evident in the evolution of the international institutions themselves. Today approximately two-thirds of the members of GATT are developing countries, whereas only one-half were developing countries when it was created. Also, the resources of both the World Bank and the IMF have increased dramatically, as has the participation of developing country members.

Certainly, the record of the international system is not perfect, but people flirt with fantasy when they suggest that it’s a failure and unfair. We know that much must still be done to help low-income countries develop domestic markets, strengthen their exports. But the way to do that is not to weaken the system that has served us so well, but to continue working together to make it better.

Now, this brings me to the third and final part of our message in Cancún—a program for action. This summit offers the leadership of the world an opportunity to chart a domestic course for—a strategic course, I should say, for a new era of international economic growth and development. And to do this, all countries, developed and developing alike, demonstrate the political will to address the real issues, confront the obstacles, and seize the opportunities for development wherever they exist.

To cite that old proverb: “Give a hungry man a fish and he’ll be hungry tomorrow; teach him how to fish and he’ll never be hungry again.”

The principles that guide our international policies can lead to the cooperative strategy for global growth that we seek. The experience of our own country and others confirms the importance of strategic principles:

—first, stimulating international trade by opening up markets, both within individual countries and between countries;

—second, tailoring particular development strategies to the specific needs and potential of individual countries and regions; —and third, guiding assistance toward the development of self-sustaining productive capacities, particularly in food and energy;

—fourth, improving in many of the countries the climate for private investment and the transfer of technology that comes with such investment; —and fifth, creating a political atmosphere in which practical solutions can move forward, rather than founder on a reef of misguided policies that restrain and interfere with the international marketplace or foster inflation.

Developing countries cannot be lumped together under the title as if their problems were identical. They’re diverse, with distinct resource endowments, cultures, languages, and national traditions. The international system is comprised of independent, sovereign nations whose separate existence testifies to their unique qualities and aspirations.

What we will seek to do at Cancún and elsewhere in subsequent meetings is examine cooperatively the roadblocks which developing countries’ policies pose to development and how they can best be removed. For example: Is there an imbalance between public and private sector activities? Are high tax rates smothering incentives and precluding growth in personal savings and investment capital? And then we must examine the obstacles which developed countries put in the way of development and how they, in turn, can best be removed. For example: Are industrial countries maintaining open markets for the products of developing countries? Do they permit unrestricted access by developing countries to their own capital markets? And finally, we must decide how developed and developing countries together can realize their potential and improve the world economy to promote a higher level of growth and development.

Our program of action includes specific, practical steps that implement the principles I've outlined.

First, stimulating international trade by opening up markets is absolutely essential. Last year, non-OPEC developing nations, by selling their products in American markets, earned $63 billion—just last year. This is more than twice the amount of total development assistance provided to all developing countries in that same year. It's time for all of us to live up to our principles by concrete actions and open markets and liberalized trade.

The most meaningful action that we could take to promote trade with developing nations in the early 1980's is to strengthen the GATT. It is through a shared, reciprocal effort within GATT that further liberalization of industrial nations' trade regimes is most likely to be achieved. This will benefit developing countries more than any other single step.

The United States will work for a successful GATT ministerial meeting in 1982.⁹ We'll launch an extensive round of consultations with all countries, including developing countries, to prepare for the GATT meeting. We will join with developing countries in working for an effective safeguards code that reflects our mutual concerns and interests. In addition, we'll continue to support the generalized system of preferences,¹⁰ and we'll take the lead in urging other developing countries to match us in expanding developing nations' access to markets.

Trade's contribution to development can be magnified by aligning trade opportunities more closely with private investment, development assistance, technology sharing. At Cancún, we will make it clear that we're ready to cooperate with other nations in putting in place this kind of integrated, complementary effort.

Actually, we're already doing so, which brings me to the second part of our program—tailoring particular development strategies to the specific needs and potential of individual countries and regions. In our own hemisphere, the United States has joined together with Mexico,

⁹ See footnote 11, Document 63.

Venezuela, and Canada to begin developing flexible, imaginative, and cooperative programs linking trade, investment, finance, foreign assistance, and private sector activities to help the nations in the Caribbean and to help them help themselves.

We met initially in Nassau in July.¹¹ Consulting then took place with the Central American countries and Panama in Costa Rica, and with the Caribbean countries in Santo Domingo. By year end, we expect to complete consultation and move forward with efforts that are tailored to specific situations in individual countries.

Third, guiding our assistance toward the development of self-sustaining productive activities, particularly in food and energy.

Increasing food production in developing countries is critically important; for some, literally, it's a matter of life or death. It's also an indispensable basis for overall development. The U.S. has always made food and agriculture an important emphasis of its economic assistance programs. We have provided massive amounts of food to fight starvation, but we have also undertaken successful agricultural research, welcomed thousands of foreign students for instruction and training at our finest institutions, and helped make discoveries of the high-yielding varieties of the Green Revolution available throughout the world.¹²

Looking to the future, our emphasis will be on the importance of market-oriented policies. We believe this approach will create rising agricultural productivity, self-sustaining capacity for research and innovation, and stimulation of job-creating entrepreneurship in rural areas.

Specifically, we've encouraged policies which reduce or eliminate subsidies to food consumers and provide adequate and stable price incentives to their agricultural sectors to increase production.¹³ We'll emphasize education and innovative joint research and development activities throughout the United States and developing countries' institutions. We will also encourage rural credit, improved storage and distribution facilities, and roads to facilitate marketing.

¹² The Green Revolution relied on the use of chemical fertilizers, pesticides, and improved seed hybrids to produce higher crop yields during the late 1960s and early 1970s.

Now, that's a lot. But we need to do more. The focus will be on raising the productivity of the small farmer, building the capacity to pursue agricultural research, and stimulating productive enterprises that generate employment and purchasing power.

We will emphasize: new methods of plant improvement to develop crops that tolerate adverse soils and climatic conditions, insects, and diseases; research to increase the efficiency of using irrigation water; systems for the production of several crops per year in the humid tropics; and methods of human and animal disease control to remove such serious problems as the tsetse fly in Africa, which bars agricultural production on vast areas of potentially productive land.

Addressing the energy problems of developing countries is also vital to their sustained economic growth. Their net oil bill in 1980 was $46 billion, up from only $4 billion in 1973. This puts tremendous pressure on their balance of payments and threatens development.

The U.S. will emphasize funding for energy-related activities in the years ahead, especially for private efforts and the mobilization of developing countries' resources. Our energy bilateral aid program must stress technical assistance rather than resource transfers. We will support energy lending by multilateral institutions, provided the projects are economically viable and they expand developing country energy production through greater private investment.

We will also support selected elements of the programs of action of the U.N. conference on new and renewable resources of energy.¹⁴ They include intensified energy training programs for technicians from developing countries and efforts to help developing countries assess and more efficiently utilize their resources.

Fourth, improving the climate for private capital flows, particularly private investment. Investment is the lifeblood of development. Private capital flows—commercial lending and private investment—can account for almost 70 percent of total financial flows to developing countries. It's impractical, not to mention foolish, to attack these flows for ideological reasons.

We call upon all our partners in finance and development—business, banks, and developing countries—to accelerate their cooperative efforts. We seek to increase co-financing and other private financing with the multilateral development banks. We want to enhance the international activities which foster private sector debt and equity financing of investments in the developing countries. Its program is increasing in both size and diversity and the bulk of IFC [International Finance Corporation] projects are privately financed in the developing countries from domestic and external sources.

We will explore the development of further safeguards for multilateral investment and ways to build upon successful bilateral experiences with these countries. We believe it is important to identify impediments to investment and trade such as conditions of political instability and the threat of expropriation. Working in concert with our trading partners, we'll seek to remove these impediments.

We will attempt to promote a general agreement of investment allowing countries to harmonize investment policies and to negotiate mutually beneficial improvements in the investment climate. Finally, we'll make an effort to identify developed and developing country tax measures which might increase market-oriented investment from both external domestic sources and in the developing countries.

Fifth, and finally, let me turn to the question of how we work together. To a remarkable degree, many nations in the world have now entered into an economic dialog. The choice before us is how to organize and conduct it. Do we persist in contentious rhetoric, or do we undertake practical tasks in a spirit of cooperation and mutual political will? I think our country has signaled the answer to that question.

We go to Cancún with a record of success and contributions second to none—determined to build on our past, ready to offer our hand in friendship as a partner in prosperity. At Cancún we will promote a revolutionary idea born more than 200 years ago, carried to our shores in the hearts of millions of immigrants and refugees, and defended by all who risked their lives so that you and I and our children could still believe in a brighter tomorrow. It's called freedom, and it works. It's still the most exciting, progressive, and successful idea the world has ever known.

In closing, I want to tell you about something a friend of yours and mine said in a speech in Washington not too long ago. Being a man of vision, with a great admiration for America, he explained that he had come on a mission from his native land—a mission to secure economic progress for his people. And he told his audience:

I am dreaming. Really I am dreaming of a drive like the drive of your grandfathers, the drive to the West. Water we have, land we have, climate we have, farming we have. But we need technology, we need know-how, new ways of irrigation, new ways of agriculture. All this one can find here in America.

And then he pleaded:

Come and be my partners . . . be pioneers like your grandfathers who opened the West and built in 200 years the most powerful country, the richest country, the great United States of America.

Those words were spoken at the U.S. Chamber of Commerce in March 1979, by Anwar Sadat.¹⁵ This courageous man of peace and hope and love has now been taken from us. But his mission, his dream remain. As we proceed to Cancún, can we not join together so that the good he wanted for all people of the world would finally become theirs and his to share? Thank you very much.

¹⁵ Sadat spoke at a March 27, 1979, dinner meeting of the Egypt-U.S. Business Council at the U.S. Chamber of Commerce headquarters; he was Washington to sign the Egyptian-Israeli peace treaty (see footnote 2, Document 17). 67. Briefing Memorandum From the Director of the Policy Planning Staff (Wolfowitz) to Secretary of State Haig¹

Washington, October 16, 1981

SUBJECT

The Near Term Need for a Comprehensive Middle East Policy Speech²

Credible reports are reaching us from the Hill to suggest that we are in danger of losing the critical "battle of perceptions" on Middle East

Our friends on the Hill are said to wonder about our concrete plan for the peace process, and in fact suggest that the apparent absence of such a plan (or at least of highly visible U.S. involvement) undercuts efforts to gain support for the Sinai MFO.⁴ They wonder if we really do have the resources to back up a proliferating series of commitments—the individual importance of which they do not dispute. They wonder what we will do if AWACS fails, or equally important, if it wins.⁵ They remain skeptical about the wisdom of other crucial initiatives like aid to Pakistan,⁶ and ignorant of other vital facts, such as the importance of Turkish aid to our Persian Gulf plans. Finally, they wonder why the White House has not yet mobilized Republican leadership support for

³ Haig underlined “coherent ‘political strategy’ for the region” and at the end of the sentence wrote: “Agree!”

the Foreign Assistance package,⁷ if that package is as vital as we say it is to our regional strategy.

We are working with Bud to devise ways to engage critical members and Hill staffers in a more sustained and deeper policy level dialogue on the reinforcing dimensions of our strategy. Genuine long term support will depend on our effectiveness in finding ways to enable Hill leaders to put their imprint on and develop a personal stake in our policy. We cannot expect dividends from this effort overnight. For the near term, a comprehensive Middle East speech could help to restore confidence in our general approach.⁸ If it were possible to orchestrate closely sequenced, mutually-reinforcing speeches by yourself and the President, we could take a good deal of the steam out of the “no policy” criticism.

To achieve maximum effect, such a speech should come after the AWACS vote, and either prior to—or in concert with—the announcement of any new initiatives. As important as your Hill AWACS statements were in providing a context for that issue, they—by themselves—do not constitute the kind of complete policy address which is now required—an address which would serve to break new ground and also prevent old ground from eroding.⁹

What is especially critical is that the speech provide an organized framework for explaining the relevance, interrelationship, and essential continuity of the various new initiatives—peace process plans; emergency security assistance supplemental; possible Libyan oil embargo; force deployments in region—now under consideration. Indeed it would be highly desirable to formally announce such new measures as we are prepared to take in the speech itself. In this way, we can a) help to dramatize the fact that these actions are part of a well-considered whole—not just hasty, isolated improvisations; b) better control the terms in which the initiatives are debated; c) demonstrate that both the peace and security discussion of our policy are backed up by concrete actions, and not just more rhetoric. Nothing could be more fatal than to announce a series of new initiatives randomly and without simultaneously attempting to revive confidence in the basic strategy from which any new actions spring.

We should think about hard news that such a speech might generate so as to underscore both the peace and security dimensions of our policy. In my opinion, you should consider using such a speech to announce initiatives on:

1. The Peace Process: Perhaps an announcement about your personal participation in the autonomy negotiations or the announcement of a special negotiator;

2. Opposing Soviet Proxies: A dramatic announcement on some action on Libya, perhaps the announcement of an oil embargo, would be a good way to underscore this theme.¹⁰

¹⁰ Haig did not make a major speech on the Middle East before the Senate voted 52 to 48 on October 28 to reject the veto proposal, which would have prevented the AWACS sale. (John M. Goshko, "Vote of 52 to 48 Is Major Victory," Washington Post, October 29, 1981, pp. A1, A8) On October 29, Haig offered comments and took part in a question and answer session at the Department with the attendees of the National Foreign Policy Conference for Editors and Broadcasters. During his introductory remarks, Haig reiterated that the President "does, indeed, have a foreign policy, and, like any sound foreign policy, it is built on a bedrock of American values and ideas." Later, he discussed the AWACS sale, noting: "We are, as you know, very gratified by the outcome of that vote. I want to emphasize, however, that this was an issue in which serious people differed—serious, well-motivated people differed. It is an issue which is now behind us, and I think in a constructive way, because it will inevitably contribute to the stability and peace process in the region." (Department of State Bulletin, December 1981, pp. 29–30)

68. Editorial Note

On October 21, 1981, at 8:31 a.m., President Ronald Reagan addressed reporters assembled at the South Portico of the White House before his departure for Cancun to attend the International Meeting on Cooperation and Development, also known as the Cancun Summit. In his remarks, the President outlined the U.S. objectives for the meeting: "Our message at Cancun will be clear. The road to prosperity and human fulfillment is lightened by economic freedom and individual incentive. As always, the United States will be a friend and an active partner in the search for a better life.

"We take with us a solid record of support for development and a positive program for the 1980s. Free people build free markets that ignite dynamic development for everyone. We will renew our commitment to strengthen and improve international trading, investment, and financial relations, and we will work for more effective cooperation to help developing countries achieve greater self-sustaining growth.

“Cancun is a unique undertaking in world affairs. Never have so many nations gathered from so many parts of the globe for a summit conference on economic growth. With cooperation and good will, this summit can be more than just another shattered dream. It can be the beginning of new hope and a better life for all.” (Public Papers: Reagan, 1981, pages 978–979)

The Cancun Summit took place October 22–23. Participants in addition to Reagan included President Sergej Kraigher of Yugoslavia, President Julius Nyerere of Tanzania, Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher of the United Kingdom, Prime Minister Zenko Suzuki of Japan, Executive President Forbes Burnham of Guyana, President Francois Mitterrand of France, Prime Minister Indira Gandhi of India, President Alhaji Shehu Shagari of Nigeria, Prime Minister Thorbjorn Falldin of Sweden, President Luis Herrera Campins of Venezuela, Acting President Abdus Sattar of Bangladesh, Foreign Minister Simeon Ake of Cote d’Ivoire, Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher of the Federal Republic of Germany, Deputy Prime Minister Crown Prince Fahd of Saudi Arabia, Foreign Minister Willibald Pahr of Austria, Foreign Minister Ramiro Saraiva Guerreiro of Brazil, Premier Zhao Ziyang of China, President Ferdinand Marcos of the Philippines, United Nations Secretary-General Kurt Waldheim, Prime Minister Pierre Elliott Trudeau of Canada, and President Jose Lopez Portillo y Pacheco of Mexico. Documentation on the summit meeting is scheduled for publication in Foreign Relations, 1981–1988, volume XXXVIII, International Economic Development; International Debt; Foreign Assistance.

Prior to the plenary session, the President was scheduled to conduct bilateral meetings with Lopez Portillo, Zhao, Gandhi, Shagari, Herrera Campins, and Kraigher. In an undated memorandum to the President, his Assistant for National Security Affairs Richard Allen asserted that these meetings “will probably be more important to the outcome of this meeting than your bilaterals were to the outcome of the Ottawa Summit.” Allen explained that the meetings were scheduled “to take place before the plenary sessions begin in order to give you an early opportunity to influence these leaders. Their support is essential to a successful outcome at the Summit.” After offering guidance specific to each of the six meetings, Allen added: “The other bilaterals are also important to the outcome of the meeting, but more by way of limiting damage. The meetings on Friday with Algeria, Tanzania and Guyana may create some anticipation that will favorably influence the positions these countries take in the plenary sessions. Bangladesh is likely to play a moderate role, and the bilateral meeting will reinforce this. The Philippines and Saudi Arabia are key U.S. partners in the quest for peace. While they may not be unusually helpful to us in the plenary meetings, they are also unlikely to take the lead against our interests. We have not scheduled separate bilaterals with industrial countries both to emphasize the developing country focus of the meeting and to avoid any appearance of needing a go-between with developing countries or of ganging up on the developing countries.” (Reagan Library, Executive Secretariat, NSC Trip File, President Reagan’s Participation in the International Meeting on Cooperation and Development Cancun, Mexico 10/21/1981–10/23/1981 Bilateral Meetings—Mr. Allen (Binder) (1); NLR–755–2–34–8–6)

The first plenary session of the summit took place on October 22. During the plenary the President read a statement, beginning his remarks by acknowledging both the differences and the commonalities of the participants in relation to economic policy. Reagan then stressed: “We recognize that each nation’s approach to development should reflect its own cultural, political, and economic heritage. That is the way it should be. The great thing about our international system is that it respects diversity and promotes creativity. Certain economic factors, of course, apply across cultural and political lines. We are mutually interdependent, but, above all, we are individually responsible.

“We must respect both diversity and economic realities when discussing grand ideas. As I said last week in Philadelphia, we do not seek an ideological debate; we seek to build upon what we already know will work.

“History demonstrates time and again, in place after place, economic growth and human progress make their greatest strides in countries that encourage economic freedom.

“Government has an important role in helping to develop a country’s economic foundation. But the critical test is whether government is genuinely working to liberate individuals by creating incentives to work, save, invest, and succeed.

“Individual farmers, laborers, owners, traders, and managers—they are the heart and soul of development. Trust them. Because whenever they are allowed to create and build, wherever they are given a personal stake in deciding economic policies and benefiting from their success, then societies become more dynamic, prosperous, progressive, and free.

“With sound understanding of our domestic freedom and responsibilities, we can construct effective international cooperation. Without it, no amount of international good will and action can produce prosperity.”

After discussing the U.S. efforts toward development efforts in the Third World and support for participation in the process of Global Negotiations, the President continued: “But our main purpose in coming to Cancun is to focus on specific questions of substance, not procedural matters. In this spirit, we bring a positive program of action for development, concentrated around these principles:

“—stimulating international trade by opening up markets, both within individual countries and among countries;

“—tailoring particular development strategies to the specific needs and potential of individual countries and regions;

“—guiding our assistance toward the development of self-sustaining productive activities, particularly in food and energy;

“—improving the climate for private capital flows, particularly private investment; and “—creating a political atmosphere in which practical solutions can move forward, rather than founder on a reef of misguided policies that restrain and interfere with the international marketplace or foster inflation.

“In our conversations, we will be elaborating on the specifics of this program. The program deals not in flashy new gimmicks, but in substantive fundamentals with a track record of success. It rests on a coherent view of what’s essential to development—namely political freedom and economic opportunity.

“Yes, we believe in freedom. We know it works. It’s just as exciting, successful, and revolutionary today as it was 200 years ago.

“I want to thank our hosts for arranging this historic opportunity. Let us join together and proceed together. Economic development is an exercise in mutual cooperation for the common good. We can and must grasp this opportunity for our people and together take a step for mankind.” (Public Papers: Reagan, 1981, pages 980–982)

In his personal diary entry for October 22, the President wrote: Met with Pres.’s (1 on 1) of Austria & Yrega Slooci [Sergej Kraicher]. Then 1st session devoted to speeches by each of 22 delegates. I know everyone was waiting for mine—possibly with chip on shoulder. We fooled them—it was well received.” (Brinkley, ed., The Reagan Diaries, volume I, January 1981–October 1985, page 77; brackets are in the original)

On October 23, during a question and answer session with reporters held in his suite at the Cancun Sheraton Hotel, the President was asked if any of the other delegates had “said anything to cause you to change your thinking about foreign aid or how you could help the poor people of the world?” Reagan responded, “No, but you have to remember that there’s no one at that table that has done more in the line of foreign aid than has the United States. And we’re concerned, have been for some time, that our foreign aid would be as effective as it can be. And many times for a program that gigantic, and over the years, you know that it can fall into ruts. And the aid is being delivered, but you want to make sure that it’s getting to the people that it’s intended to help.

“So, we had a very good discussion yesterday on food and agriculture for the countries that have that problem. And I think we’ve made a contribution to them, in proposals as to how we could go in—you might say that that’s a task force route—and find out exactly how their own agricultural output could be improved.” (Public Papers: Reagan, 1981, page 983)

On that same day, Lopez Portillo and Trudeau, issued on their own behalf, a summary of the sessions. The text of the summary is printed in Department of State Bulletin, December 1981, pages 5–9.

In remarks made on October 24 at Andrews Air Force Base upon his return to Washington, Reagan referred to the motivations guiding the United States in contributing toward economic development, which he had previously outlined in his Philadelphia remarks (see Document 66): “At Cancun, we stressed many of those same important themes and the commitment of the United States to work with those countries in their development efforts. There was broad agreement on steps which had to be taken by the developing countries themselves, and by developed and developing countries together, to stimulate the process of growth. There was broad acceptance of many of the approaches proposed in Philadelphia and a strong desire to work with the United States in these areas.

“All participants recognized the fact that economic prosperity in any country or group of countries depends both on individual countries own efforts and on close international economic cooperation. We didn’t waste time on unrealistic rhetoric or unattainable objectives. We dealt with pragmatic solutions to the problems of growth—efforts to improve food security and agricultural development.

“There was agreement with our proposal that task forces should be sent to developing countries to assist them in finding new agricultural techniques and transmitting to farmers techniques now in existence. I have directed the Agency for International Development to coordinate these U.S. efforts and to report to us on the progress made.

“We also discussed ways to increase trade and industrialization, and there was strong support for working together at the GATT Ministerial. In addition, ways were discussed in which the developing nations can increase their energy production, and monetary and financial issues were reviewed.

“I return home reminded again of the importance of American leadership in the world. At Cancun, we made a good beginning toward more constructive and mutually beneficial relations among developed and developing nations and toward a more prosperous world. We have an enormous opportunity now to advance mutually beneficial economic relations with our developing country partners.

“I look forward to continuing our efforts in the constructive spirit that characterized the Cancun discussions. By sustaining that spirit, the American people, the people of the developing nations, and the entire world will be better.” (Public Papers: Reagan, 1981, pages 986–987)

69. Remarks by President Reagan¹

Washington, November 18, 1981

Remarks to Members of the National Press Club on Arms Reduction and Nuclear Weapons

Officers, ladies and gentlemen of the National Press Club and, as of a very short time ago, fellow members:

Back in April while in the hospital I had, as you can readily understand, a lot of time for reflection. And one day I decided to send a personal, handwritten letter to Soviet President Leonid Brezhnev² reminding him that we had met about 10 years ago in San Clemente, California, as he and President Nixon were concluding a series of meetings that had brought hope to all the world.³ Never had peace and good will seemed closer at hand.

¹ Source: Public Papers: Reagan, 1981, pp. 1062–1067. The President spoke at 10 a.m. at the National Press Club building. His remarks were broadcast live on radio and television. The Department transmitted the text of the address to all diplomatic posts in telegram 306352, November 18, 1218Z. (Department of State, Central Foreign Policy File, Electronic Telegrams, D810619–0897; D810575–0221; D810546–0823) Documentation concerning the drafting of the speech, including a draft with the President’s handwritten additions and comments, is in the Reagan Library, WHORM: Subject File, Speeches, SP 563, Foreign Policy Address, National Press Club, Washington, DC, 11/18/1981, 050500–050999. In his personal diary entry for November 18, the President wrote: “Today was the big day—the speech to the world at the Nat. press club. It really was to the world. I’m told it was the largest network ever put together—all of Europe, China & I don’t know how many other places. It has been wonderfully received worldwide except for Russia—Tass is screaming bloody murder. I asked Russia to join us in total elimination of all medium range nuclear weapons in Europe. Funny—I was talking peace but wearing a bullet proof vest. It seems Kadaffi put a contract on me & some person named Jack was going to try for me at the speech. Security was very tight.” (Brinkley, ed., The Reagan Diaries, vol. I, January 1981–October 1985, p. 85)

I'd like to read you a few paragraphs from that letter. "Mr. President: When we met, I asked if you were aware that the hopes and aspirations of millions of people throughout the world were dependent on the decisions that would be reached in those meetings. You took my hand in both of yours and assured me that you were aware of that and that you were dedicated with all your heart and soul and mind to fulfilling those hopes and dreams."

I went on in my letter to say: "The people of the world still share that hope. Indeed, the peoples of the world, despite differences in racial and ethnic origin, have very much in common. They want the dignity of having some control over their individual lives, their destiny. They want to work at the craft or trade of their own choosing and to be fairly rewarded. They want to raise their families in peace without harming anyone or suffering harm themselves. Government exists for their convenience, not the other way around.

"If they are incapable, as some would have us believe, of self-government, then where among them do we find any who are capable of governing others?

"Is it possible that we have permitted ideology, political and economic philosophies, and governmental policies to keep us from considering the very real, everyday problems of our peoples? Will the average Soviet family be better off or even aware that the Soviet Union has imposed a government of its own choice on the people of Afghanistan? Is life better for the people of Cuba because the Cuban military dictate who shall govern the people of Angola?

"It is often implied that such things have been made necessary because of territorial ambitions of the United States; that we have imperialistic designs, and thus constitute a threat to your own security and that of the newly emerging nations. Not only is there no evidence to support such a charge, there is solid evidence that the United States, when it could have dominated the world with no risk to itself, made no effort whatsoever to do so.

"When World War II ended, the United States had the only undamaged industrial power in the world. Our military might was at its peak, and we alone had the ultimate weapon, the nuclear weapon, with the unquestioned ability to deliver it anywhere in the world. If we had sought world domination then, who could have opposed us?

"But the United States followed a different course, one unique in the history of mankind. We used our power and wealth to rebuild the war-ravished economies of the world, including those of the nations who had been our enemies. May I say, there is absolutely no substance to charges that the United States is guilty of imperialism or attempts to impose its will on other countries, by use of force."

I continued my letter by saying—or concluded my letter, I should say—by saying, “Mr. President, should we not be concerned with eliminating the obstacles which prevent our people, those you and I represent, from achieving their most cherished goals?”

Well, it’s in the same spirit that I want to speak today to this audience and the people of the world about America’s program for peace and the coming negotiations which begin November 30th in Geneva, Switzerland.⁴ Specifically, I want to present our program for preserving peace in Europe and our wider program for arms control.

Twice in my lifetime, I have seen the peoples of Europe plunged into the tragedy of war. Twice in my lifetime, Europe has suffered destruction and military occupation in wars that statesmen proved powerless to prevent, soldiers unable to contain, and ordinary citizens unable to escape. And twice in my lifetime, young Americans have bled their lives into the soil of those battlefields not to enrich or enlarge our domain, but to restore the peace and independence of our friends and Allies.

All of us who lived through those troubled times share a common resolve that they must never come again. And most of us share a common appreciation of the Atlantic Alliance that has made a peaceful, free, and prosperous Western Europe in the post-war era possible.

But today, a new generation is emerging on both sides of the Atlantic. Its members were not present at the creation of the North Atlantic Alliance. Many of them don’t fully understand its roots in defending freedom and rebuilding a war-torn continent. Some young people question why we need weapons, particularly nuclear weapons, to deter war and to assure peaceful development. They fear that the accumulation of weapons itself may lead to conflagration. Some even propose unilateral disarmament.

I understand their concerns. Their questions deserve to be answered. But we have an obligation to answer their questions on the basis of judgment and reason and experience. Our policies have resulted in the longest European peace in this century. Wouldn’t a rash departure from these policies, as some now suggest, endanger that peace?

From its founding, the Atlantic Alliance has preserved the peace through unity, deterrence, and dialog. First, we and our Allies have stood united by the firm commitment that an attack upon any one of us would be considered an attack upon us all. Second, we and our Allies have deterred aggression by maintaining forces strong enough to ensure that any aggressor would lose more from an attack than he could possibly gain. And third, we and our Allies have engaged the Soviets in a dialog about mutual restraint and arms limitations, hoping to reduce the risk of war and the burden of armaments and to lower the barriers that divide East from West.

These three elements of our policy have preserved the peace in Europe for more than a third of a century. They can preserve it for generations to come, so long as we pursue them with sufficient will and vigor.

Today, I wish to reaffirm America's commitment to the Atlantic Alliance and our resolve to sustain the peace. And from my conversations with allied leaders, I know that they also remain true to this tried and proven course.

NATO's policy of peace is based on restraint and balance. No NATO weapons, conventional or nuclear, will ever be used in Europe except in response to attack. NATO's defense plans have been responsible and restrained. The Allies remain strong, united, and resolute. But the momentum of the continuing Soviet military buildup threatens both the conventional and the nuclear balance.

Consider the facts. Over the past decade, the United States reduced the size of its Armed Forces and decreased its military spending. The Soviets steadily increased the number of men under arms. They now number more than double those of the United States. Over the same period, the Soviets expanded their real military spending by about one-third. The Soviet Union increased its inventory of tanks to some 50,000, compared to our 11,000. Historically a land power, they transformed their navy from a coastal defense force to an open ocean fleet, while the United States, a sea power with transoceanic alliances, cut its fleet in half.

During a period when NATO deployed no new intermediate-range nuclear missiles and actually withdrew 1,000 nuclear warheads, the Soviet Union deployed more than 750 nuclear warheads on the new SS-20 missiles alone.

Our response to this relentless buildup of Soviet military power has been restrained but firm. We have made decisions to strengthen all three legs of the strategic triad: sea-, land-, and air-based.⁵ We have proposed a defense program in the United States for the next 5 years

⁵ Reference is to the U.S. strategic weapons program. On October 2, in remarks made to reporters in the East Room at the White House, the President indicated that the administration's plan to revitalize U.S. strategic forces "is a comprehensive one. It will strengthen and modernize the strategic triad of land-based missiles, sea-based missiles, and bombers. It will end longstanding delays in some of these programs and introduce new elements into others. And just as important, it will improve communications and control systems that are vital to these strategic forces." (Public Papers: Reagan, 1981, p. 878) which will remedy the neglect of the past decade and restore the eroding balance on which our security depends.⁶

I would like to discuss more specifically the growing threat to Western Europe which is posed by the continuing deployment of certain Soviet intermediate-range nuclear missiles. The Soviet Union has three different type such missile systems: the SS-20, the SS-4, and the SS-5, all with the range capable of reaching virtually all of Western Europe. There are other Soviet weapon systems which also represent a major threat.

Now, the only answer to these systems is a comparable threat to Soviet threats, to Soviet targets; in other words, a deterrent preventing the use of these Soviet weapons by the counterthreat of a like response against their own territory. At present, however, there is no equivalent deterrent to these Soviet intermediate missiles. And the Soviets continue to add one new SS-20 a week.

To counter this, the Allies agreed in 1979, as part of a two-track decision, to deploy as a deterrent land-based cruise missiles and Pershing II missiles capable of reaching targets in the Soviet Union. These missiles are to be deployed in several countries of Western Europe. This relatively limited force in no way serves as a substitute for the much larger strategic umbrella spread over our NATO Allies. Rather, it provides a vital link between conventional shorter-range nuclear forces in Europe and intercontinental forces in the United States.

Deployment of these systems will demonstrate to the Soviet Union that this link cannot be broken. Deterring war depends on the perceived ability of our forces to perform effectively. The more effective our forces are, the less likely it is that we'll have to use them. So, we and our allies are proceeding to modernize NATO's nuclear forces of intermediate range to meet increased Soviet deployments of nuclear systems threatening Western Europe.

Let me turn now to our hopes for arms control negotiations. There's a tendency to make this entire subject overly complex. I want to be clear and concise. I told you of the letter I wrote to President Brezhnev last April. Well, I've just sent another message to the Soviet leadership.⁷ It's a simple, straightforward, yet, historic message. The United States proposes the mutual reduction of conventional intermediate-range nuclear and strategic forces. Specifically, I have proposed a four-point agenda to achieve this objective in my letter to President Brezhnev.

⁷ Reference is to the President's November 17 letter to Brezhnev, printed in Foreign Relations, 1981-1983, vol. III, Soviet Union, January 1981-January 1983, Document 103.

The first and most important point concerns the Geneva negotiations. As part of the 1979 two-track decision, NATO made a commitment to seek arms control negotiations with the Soviet Union on intermediate range nuclear forces. The United States has been preparing for these negotiations through close consultation with our NATO partners.

We're now ready to set forth our proposal. I have informed President Brezhnev that when our delegation travels to the negotiations on intermediate range, land-based nuclear missiles in Geneva on the 30th of this month, my representatives will present the following proposal: The United States is prepared to cancel its deployment of Pershing II and ground-launch cruise missiles if the Soviets will dismantle their SS-20, SS-4, and SS-5 missiles.⁸ This would be an historic step. With Soviet agreement, we could together substantially reduce the dread threat of nuclear war which hangs over the people of Europe. This, like the first footstep on the Moon, would be a giant step for mankind.

Now, we intend to negotiate in good faith and go to Geneva willing to listen to and consider the proposals of our Soviet counterparts, but let me call to your attention the background against which our proposal is made.

During the past 6 years while the United States deployed no new intermediate-range missiles and withdrew 1,000 nuclear war-heads from Europe, the Soviet Union deployed 750 warheads on mobile, accurate ballistic missiles. They now have 1,100 war-heads on the SS-20s, SS-4s and 5s. And the United States has no comparable missiles. Indeed, the United States dismantled the last such missile in Europe over 15 years ago.

As we look to the future of the negotiations, it's also important to address certain Soviet claims, which left unrefuted could become critical barriers to real progress in arms control.

The Soviets assert that a balance of intermediate range nuclear forces already exists. That assertion is wrong. By any objective measure, as this chart indicates,⁹ the Soviet Union has developed an increasingly overwhelming advantage. They now enjoy a superiority on the order of six to one. The red is the Soviet buildup; the blue is our own. That is 1975, and that is 1981.

⁹ The text of the President's remarks printed in Public Papers: Reagan, 1981, does not include the chart the President references. The text printed in American Foreign Policy: Current Documents, 1981, includes the chart, entitled "Balance of Comparable US and Soviet Intermediate Range Nuclear Forces." (American Foreign Policy: Current Documents, 1981, pp. 177–182)

Now, Soviet spokesmen have suggested that moving their SS-20s behind the Ural Mountains will remove the threat to Europe. Well, as this map demonstrates, the SS-20s, even if deployed behind the Urals, will have a range that puts almost all of Western Europe—the great cities—Rome, Athens, Paris, London, Brussels, Amsterdam, Berlin, and so many more—all of Scandinavia, all of the Middle East, all of northern Africa, all within range of these missiles which, incidentally, are mobile and can be moved on shorter notice.¹⁰ These little images mark the present location which would give them a range clear out into the Atlantic.

The second proposal that I've made to President Brezhnev concerns strategic weapons. The United States proposes to open negotiations on strategic arms as soon as possible next year.

I have instructed Secretary Haig to discuss the timing of such meetings with Soviet representatives. Substance, however, is far more important than timing. As our proposal for the Geneva talks this month illustrates, we can make proposals for genuinely serious reductions, but only if we take the time to prepare carefully.

The United States has been preparing carefully for resumption of strategic arms negotiations because we don't want a repetition of past disappointments. We don't want an arms control process that sends hopes soaring only to end in dashed expectations.

Now, I have informed President Brezhnev that we will seek to negotiate substantial reductions in nuclear arms which would result in levels that are equal and verifiable. Our approach to verification will be to emphasize openness and creativity, rather than the secrecy and suspicion which have undermined confidence in arms control in the past.

While we can hope to benefit from work done over the past decade in strategic arms negotiations, let us agree to do more than simply begin where these previous efforts left off. We can and should attempt major qualitative and quantitative progress. Only such progress can fulfill the hopes of our own people and the rest of the world. And let us see how far we can go in achieving truly substantial reductions in our strategic arsenals.

To symbolize this fundamental change in direction, we will call these negotiations START—Strategic Arms Reduction Talks.

The third proposal I've made to the Soviet Union is that we act to achieve equality at lower levels of conventional forces in Europe. The defense needs of the Soviet Union hardly call for maintaining more ¹⁰ The text of the President's remarks printed in Public Papers: Reagan, 1981, does not include the map the President references. The text printed in American Foreign Policy: Current Documents, 1981, includes the map, entitled "Coverage of Europe From SS-20 Bases East of the Urals." combat divisions in East Germany today than were in the whole Allied invasion force that landed in Normandy on D-Day. The Soviet Union could make no more convincing contribution to peace in Europe, and in the world, than by agreeing to reduce its conventional forces significantly and constrain the potential for sudden aggression.

Finally, I have pointed out to President Brezhnev that to maintain peace we must reduce the risks of surprise attack and the chance of war arising out of uncertainty or miscalculation.

I am renewing our proposal for a conference to develop effective measures that would reduce these dangers. At the current Madrid meeting of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe, we're laying the foundation for a Western-proposed conference on disarmament in Europe.¹¹ This conference would discuss new measures to enhance stability and security in Europe. Agreement in this conference is within reach. I urge the Soviet Union to join us and many other nations who are ready to launch this important enterprise.

All of these proposals are based on the same fair-minded principles—substantial, militarily significant reduction in forces, equal ceilings for similar types of forces, and adequate provisions for verification.

My administration, our country, and I are committed to achieving arms reductions agreements based on these principles. Today I have outlined the kinds of bold, equitable proposals which the world expects of us. But we cannot reduce arms unilaterally. Success can only come if the Soviet Union will share our commitment, if it will demonstrate that its often-repeated professions of concern for peace will be matched by positive action.

Preservation of peace in Europe and the pursuit of arms reduction talks are of fundamental importance. But we must also help to bring peace and security to regions now torn by conflict, external intervention, and war.

The American concept of peace goes well beyond the absence of war. We foresee a flowering of economic growth and individual liberty in a world at peace.

At the economic summit conference in Cancún, I met with the leaders of 21 nations and sketched out our approach to global economic growth.¹² We want to eliminate the barriers to trade and investment which hinder these critical incentives to growth, and we're working to develop new programs to help the poorest nations achieve self-sustaining growth.

And terms like “peace” and “security”, we have to say, have little meaning for the oppressed and the destitute. They also mean little to the individual whose state has stripped him of human freedom and dignity. Wherever there is oppression, we must strive for the peace and security of individuals as well as states. We must recognize that progress and the pursuit of liberty is a necessary complement to military security. Nowhere has this fundamental truth been more boldly and clearly stated than in the Helsinki Accords of 1975.¹³ These accords have not yet been translated into living reality.

Today I’ve announced an agenda that can help to achieve peace, security, and freedom across the globe. In particular, I have made an important offer to forego entirely deployment of new American missiles in Europe if the Soviet Union is prepared to respond on an equal footing.

There is no reason why people in any part of the world should have to live in permanent fear of war or its spectre. I believe the time has come for all nations to act in a responsible spirit that doesn’t threaten other states. I believe the time is right to move forward on arms control and the resolution of critical regional disputes at the conference table. Nothing will have a higher priority for me and for the American people over the coming months and years.

Addressing the United Nations 20 years ago, another American President described the goal that we still pursue today. He said, “If we all can persevere, if we can look beyond our shores and ambitions, then surely the age will dawn in which the strong are just and the weak secure and the peace preserved.”¹⁴

He didn’t live to see that goal achieved. I invite all nations to join with America today in the quest for such a world.

Thank you.¹⁵

¹⁵ In a November 21 memorandum to the President, Haig provided a summary of global reaction to the President’s remarks: “Overseas reaction to your speech—which was viewed by a world audience estimated at 250 million people—is overwhelmingly positive. Virtually every Western head of state, foreign minister and political leader, has welcomed the speech as a clear and effective statement of America’s foreign policy and commitment to peace.” (Reagan Library, European and Soviet Affairs Directorate, NSC Records, Subject File, State of the Union Speech (1 of 4)) Under a November 25 covering memorandum, Allen sent Haig’s memorandum to the President, noting: “In general, we accomplished what we intended in the speech, and it should provide a solid basis on which to begin talks with the Soviets next week.” Reagan initialed Allen’s memorandum, which also bears a stamped notation indicating that Reagan saw it on December 1. SUBJECT

Charges of Foreign Policy Disarray

For whatever it is worth, I have set down some thoughts about the charge that Reagan Administration foreign policy is in disarray. I had the benefit of participating in some of the general foreign policy planning activities during the transition. Moreover, in rereading the first two planning documents produced by Richard Beal's office (one in January and one in April—see attached),² I was struck by the extent to which the evolution of our foreign policy has followed a deliberate and discernible, albeit rough, set of assumptions and guidelines. The charge that this Administration has no foreign policy is, I think, flatly wrong. The charge reflects a failure to understand the intimate connection between domestic and foreign policy affairs.

In that spirit, let me lay out the elements of the Reagan Administration's foreign policy design, illustrated by examples of our early successes, which I have used to good effect in my off-the-record speaking.

1. Our priority foreign policy objective has been to restore the domestic capabilities (both economic and military) and credibility (political will and self-confidence) of America's foreign policy leadership. Hence, neglect of foreign policy due to a preoccupation with domestic policy is not a valid criticism of this Administration. Domestic and foreign policy are intimately linked (a favorite premise of liberal analysts) and this Administration understands that restored domestic vitality—economically, militarily and politically—is the essential foundation of an effective foreign policy.

Successes:

A. Passage of Economic Recovery Act of 1981—already unprecedented action on tax, regulatory and expenditure policies.³ Continued success depends on political capability to sustain coalition for further budget cuts, clearly impaired by Stockman affair but not irreparable.⁴ Even if further cuts cannot be made, fight Congressional elections next year on this theme, since alternatives—tax increases or loosened money policy—are failed policies of the past.

B. Defense decisions—demonstrated President's commitment to close window of vulnerability in its broadest sense without taking premature decisions on basing modes for land missiles which would only invite a massive escalation of USSR warheads targeted on the U.S. with no resultant improvement in U.S. missile force survivability.⁵ (We should exploit the pro-arms control aspects of this decision. The President chose a path which takes away the rationale for a massive escalation of Soviet weaponry to which we would then be compelled to respond.)

C. AWACS decision—demonstrated this President's capability to command a domestic consensus on a very controversial aspect of U.S. foreign policy.⁶ It has done more than a thousand doctrines (e.g., the Carter Doctrine)⁷ to restore foreign perceptions in the Middle East/Persian Gulf of the credibility of American commitments.

D. Self-confident, non-apologetic expression and defense of American values and institutions in the international system—the President's development speeches at the World Bank and Philadelphia⁸ called American foreign policy back to a clear vision of this country's purpose and our belief in the principles and ideals of political freedom and economic opportunity (as he promised to do early in the campaign in his Chicago speech of March 1980).⁹

2. While restoring domestic vitality to American foreign policy, this Administration has sought to address foreign policy problems in limited, specific and pragmatic ways, emphasizing bilateral and regional rather than global or grand strategic approaches. Hence, to criticize this Administration for the absence of foreign policy pronouncements, which is often equated in the press with the absence of a foreign policy itself, is to confirm the

⁴Stockman criticized the Reagan administration's economic recovery program during a series of interviews scheduled for publication in The Atlantic Monthly in December. ⁹Presumable reference to Reagan's March 17, 1980, address before the Chicago Council on Foreign Relations. According to the New York Times, Reagan had outlined "a 'grand strategy' based on three principles: 'firm convictions' in the rightness of America's cause; a 'strong economy based on a free market,' and America's 'unquestioned capability' to keep the peace through superior weaponry." (Steven V. Roberts, "Reagan, in Chicago Speech, Urges Big Increases in Military Spending," New York Times, March 18, 1980, p. B8)

Administration's success in holding foreign policy pronouncements to a minimum while domestic capabilities and credibility are being strengthened and the yawning gap between America's strategic proclamations and real capabilities is being closed.

Successes:

A. At NATO Ministerial in May and Ottawa Summit in July,¹⁰ obtained allied agreement to hold firm on NATO defense decisions of December 1979, including Schmidt's publicly-stated willingness to stake his political future on these decisions. (Would he have done that under Carter?)

B. Middle East—AWACS sale is not an isolated arms transfer but a major step forward in reestablishing strategic confidence in the U.S.-Saudi relationship and reinforcing Saudi Arabia's new activist foreign policy in Lebanon ceasefire,¹¹ in the Arab-Israeli dispute (Fahd's peace plan),¹² in the work of the Gulf Cooperation Council,¹³ and in OPEC (the new Saudi-engineered long-term OPEC pricing strategy).¹⁴ This more aggressive Saudi foreign policy, coupled with the U.S.-led effort to isolate the radical Arabs (Libya, etc.) is probably the key to the next step forward in the peace process, slowly bringing the Saudis, Jordanians and moderate Palestinians into some relationship (perhaps not formal) with the Camp David process. U.S. leadership is also about to produce a Sinai peacekeeping force which includes European contingents that identify European governments in a more visible way than ever before with the evolving Camp David process.¹⁵

C. Central America—Initially addressed a serious, specific situation in El Salvador (where admittedly our rhetoric at times got out of control) but quickly proceeded to wrap the El Salvador problem into

F. North American Relations—Development of close personal relations with the leaders of our two neighbors which accounts in part for the success of the two Economic Summits (one chaired by Trudeau, the other by Trudeau and Lopez Portillo) and the containment thus far of severe bilateral problems, particularly investment policies with Canada and trade policies with Mexico.

During the October 29 question and answer session with attendees of the National Foreign Policy Conference for Editors and Broadcasters (see footnote 10, Document 67) Haig responded to a question regarding the Reagan administration's "official policy toward South Africa," indicating that "South Africa has come to accept 435, to accept the U.N. presence in Namibia, and we have just completed drafting a set of broad principles on about a page and a half which would be reinforcing the provisions of 435. It is currently being negotiated by the contact group with the front-line states and with South Africa. That represents progress, hopeful progress." of restraint and reciprocity in Soviet foreign policy. The means to achieve these objectives have been primarily domestic (sending signals of a new activist U.S. foreign policy through the economic and defense programs) and bilateral or regional (e.g. El Salvador or building a strategic consensus against the Soviet threat in the Middle East and Persian Gulf). Meanwhile, global diplomacy toward the Soviet Union (and China, for that matter) has been muted, at least compared to the Kissinger and Carter years. To some extent, the emphasis on domestic capabilities and deemphasis of global diplomacy have contributed to the criticism that U.S. policy is too militaristic (i.e. too oriented toward capabilities and insufficiently oriented toward psychology and politics, particularly in Europe). But, given the Reagan emphasis on foreign policy fundamentals (domestic resources and specific problems), diplomacy understood as global maneuvering and posturing (US–USSR Summits, triangular diplomacy, etc.) becomes less necessary at least in the short-term. When U.S. capabilities were in full retreat after the Vietnam War, diplomacy was all the United States had left to work with. Now, with U.S. capabilities being refurnished, diplomacy does not need to carry the entire burden.

Successes:

A. Have achieved a reaffirmation of NATO defense decisions and taken unprecedented domestic defense decisions before beginning formal process of arms control talks with Soviets (thereby ensuring that NATO and domestic defense decisions would not easily become hostage to arms control bargaining).

B. Have focused international attention on Soviet-inspired terrorism and subversion in Central America, Indo-China (including Soviet use of poison gases), and in Europe.

C. Have deliberately (thereby lowering expectations) initiated arms control discussions with the Soviet Union.

D. Have initiated effort to show shallowness of Soviet diplomacy by countering Soviet peace offensive in Europe and by pointing to Soviet absence from Cancun and the developing world (except as an arms supplier).

I have sometimes used the metaphor of an edifice to relate the three principal aspects of U.S. foreign policy underscored above.

—The foundation of the edifice is represented by the domestic efforts of U.S. foreign policy to restore economic, military and political vitality to American society.

—The pillars of the edifice are our specific bilateral and regional policies grounded in the realities of our capabilities, rather than the rhetoric of expansive doctrines, and essential to support the global superstructure of U.S. foreign policy.

—The superstructure is the U.S.-Soviet relation which is neither the centerpiece (or foundation) of all American foreign policy, as it seemed to be under Nixon, nor simply one issue like all others, as Carter implied through his initial deemphasis of US-Soviet relations in favor of so-called third tier countries (India, Brazil, etc.).

I would appreciate any comments you might have on these thoughts.

Paper Prepared in the National Security Council Staff²⁰

FOREIGN POLICY AT THE BEGINNING

US Confidence, Leadership and the Margin of Safety

Nothing would contribute more to international stability and to domestic revitalization in the United States, including economic recovery, than the United States' recovering its confidence, leadership and margin of safety in world affairs.

Unfortunately, the prevailing sense among many Americans, and the country's allies and adversaries, is that the United States is uncertain of its national interests and role in world affairs. United States foreign policy has recently been fraught with ambiguity, uncertainty, and inconsistency. Worse still is the growing view that America has grown weak in its foreign policy resolve, in its defense posture, and in its ability to respond to security threats around the globe.

The principal policy objectives of the foreign and defense policy of the new administration in the initial phase are to establish the President's credibility and leadership in foreign affairs and the country's commitment to peace through a new margin of safety. This objective will signal the American people and the rest of the world that President Reagan is committed to giving directions and consistency to America's foreign policy, thereby enabling the country to play a constructive role in world affairs.

The credibility of the US is predicated upon a reversal of the adverse force imbalances and upon the creation of a new margin of safety. This in turn is achieved by being willing to commit sufficient resources to rearm in the areas of defense, intelligence, information and foreign assistance. Clear signals must be sent out early that while the Reagan administration recognizes military power is not a policy panacea, it also recognizes that military power is vital. The message must be unambiguously conveyed—the United States does not intend to confront the international challenges of the 1980s poorly armed or hesitant to use military force when appropriate. Supplemental budget increases are essential to augment the readiness of our conventional forces, to reduce vulnerabilities in our deterrent forces, and to improve the collection and analysis activities, as well as morale, of our intelligence community. The effect will be to increase the confidence of friends and the deterrence of foes.

These budget increases are manageable if prepared with wisdom, proper targeting and exacting cost-efficiency. They contrast with the sobering cuts in spending on the domestic side and therefore must be managed with care. But this contrast increases their significance as a signal to the domestic public, allies and foes alike. Domestic budget requirements cannot be an excuse for insufficient defense and foreign policy commitments. After all, that is precisely the excuse our allies use. Where then, is the demonstration of new American leadership?

Presenting a budget that cuts spending in many entitlement programs while increasing spending in defense areas is precisely the approach public opinion currently supports. It is essential to seize this opportunity early. The impact on the psychology of the American people in the two most important areas of current concern—foreign policy and economic conditions—will be dramatic. And in energy, one area in particular, the perception of a stronger American defense commitment in the Middle East may go a long way to reassure oil producers (e.g., Kuwait, Saudi Arabia, etc.) in this area to sustain high levels of oil production and to prevent another major world and domestic oil price increase arising from the Iran–Iraq war.

Strategic Policies

The Administration can meet the requirement to reestablish confidence, leadership and muscle in US foreign policy and defense programs through the following long-range policies:

—Restore the margin of safety in US security by laying out a long-range defense program.

—Rearm US foreign policy by revitalizing intelligence, information and foreign assistance programs.

—Respond vigorously and assertively to the challenges of Soviet power, Allied and Third World diversity, and interdependence, managing crises (hostages, Poland, Central America, etc.) in a context of confidence and conviction.

—Establish a strong collaborative relationship with US Allies, emphasizing a division-of-labor concept as the springboard for conducting foreign relations.

—Establish a regional security framework in the Middle East/Persian Gulf to deter Soviet adventurism, local instability and conflict, and the cutoff of vital oil supplies to the West.

Policy Additions

—Ensure political flexibility in the event of significant interruption of oil supplies (and/or strategic minerals) by a comprehensive national security energy policy including stockpiling, domestic allocation and international agreements.

—Develop a national policy for using the strength of American agriculture in support of US foreign policy goals. Policy should address production as well as distribution of foodstuffs.

Rationale for Additions

—Oil dependence of US, Western Europe and Japan will continue in the future.

—Competition for oil will turn fierce when USSR becomes net importer in the 1980s.

—Same holds true for cobalt, manganese, chromium.

—World food shortage is on us; will get worse.

Strategic Objectives

To secure US vital interests and in order to meet effectively the varied threats to these interests, the Administration must maintain a clear focus on the following long-range strategic objectives:

—Establish a sound domestic base. A stable economic foundation with a clear commitment to a robust defense program is a precondition for a successful foreign policy.

—Restore a level of strategic nuclear warfighting capabilities so that the United States is not vulnerable to crisis intimidation.

—Counter growth of Soviet military capabilities and surge of Soviet power into areas vital to US and Western security interests.

SUBJECT

Preempting Brezhnev—A strategy for Sustaining our Momentum and Balance in Europe

Your November 18th speech clearly took the initiative away from the Soviets in Europe.² Now the challenge is to sustain our momentum and our balance. We need to focus attention both on real threats to peace and on US policy initiatives. This will preclude the extremes of detente atmospherics or undiluted confrontation.

To keep the initiative, we need to combine policy and public drama—as you did so effectively on November 18th. With that in mind, we propose four Presidential initiatives over the next six months.

1. Global Program for Peace. To avoid imbalance, we need to present the broader part of the threat picture and our policy agenda. Beyond arms control, there are the critical issues of southern Africa, Middle East, Afghanistan, Kampuchea, the Caribbean and Central America. This is important for Europe (which is involved in all of them, but tends to consider them less important than arms control) and for a broader audience as well. You could present this Global Program for Peace in a State of the World-type address in February, following the State of the Union.

2. Afghanistan Day. Of all these geopolitical issues, Afghanistan offers the best single opportunity for building European and global opposition to Soviet expansionism. As the demonstrations in Bonn during Brezhnev's visit proved, Afghanistan is our best issue among younger Europeans.³ And the vote in the UN for this year's Afghanistan resolution was even larger than last year's (116 vs. 111). With our encouragement, both the European Parliament and U.S. Congress are Eagleburger sent the memorandum to Haig under a December 1 typewritten note, writing: "The attached memo for the President outlines a strategy to sustain the momentum in Europe which his speech helped to generate. It is clear the President can provide a special dimension, particularly in the area of political drama. We have designed the strategy to space four initiatives over a six month period not to overload his schedule." (Ibid.) Also scheduled for publication in Foreign Relations, 1981–1988, vol. moving forward resolutions to establish a world-wide “Afghanistan Day” for March 21st. Your personal involvement can make a critical difference in building American and international support as the “Day” approaches. We will be sending you a strategy paper.

3. Dramatizing the Start of START. Setting a date to begin START and, more importantly, coming up with a serious and attractive approach can also be used to our advantage.⁴ While we need to avoid placing START back as the centerpiece of US-Soviet relations, and while the soundness of our approach is far more important than the drama with which we field it, we should seek to ensure—e.g., with another speech (hopefully by the end of March)—that we get credit for breathing new life into hopes for meaningful strategic arms control.

4. Trip to Europe. A presidential visit acts traditionally to focus public attention in both Europe and the United States on the deeper foundations of the Atlantic relationship. There will be a number of things to celebrate—Spain’s entry into NATO, the 25th anniversary of the European Community, the 35th anniversary of the Marshall Plan. We could combine a NATO Summit for late May with an Economic Summit early in June—which President Mitterrand has written asking you to confirm. Chancellor Schmidt has been pressing you to visit the Federal Republic and there are other bilateral stops of importance. This might be the right time and setting for a major speech on freedom as the dominant force of the future.

Conclusion. I will be sending you memoranda on each of these four initiatives in coming weeks.⁵ We wanted you to see them now in the context of an overall program to sustain our momentum in Europe, and to keep the balance between threat and solution, and between arms control and geopolitical issues.

I would like to discuss your trip privately and in a preliminary fashion with the French, Germans, and British during the NATO Ministerial next week.⁶ This is important if we are to control planning already underway for the spring NATO meeting and the Economic Summit.

Recommendation:

That I be authorized to discuss, in principle, a trip to Europe when I meet with key Allied leaders next week.⁷

⁴ On May 31, 1982, the administration announced that the United States and the Soviet Union would begin formal negotiations on the limitation and reduction of strategic arms in Geneva on June 29. (Public Papers: Reagan, 1982, Book I, p. 710) See footnote 14, Document 99.

Memo to the President on Speeches

Issue for Decision/Essential Factors

It is important to move swiftly to build on the favorable reception at home and abroad of the Press Club speech.² We agreed with EUR that the Presidential speeches most needed over the next six months are the following:

1) A speech on American Values and Foreign Policy to emphasize the moral components of our policies and try to build allied support and domestic bipartisan foreign consensus around the themes of peace and freedom.

2) A speech on Resources for Peace and Security to gather Congressional support and diminish public skepticism over our foreign assistance program.

3) A speech (perhaps keyed to Sinai withdrawal/autonomy progress/Namibia progress) setting forth our concrete program for peace as regards Regional Conflicts to capitalize on progress and rally support for our much criticized approaches.

The Press Club speech showed what an indispensable asset the President is in putting Administration policy across, particularly by putting his personal imprint on it.

The attached memo would recommend and describe to the President the three speeches suggested in your memo to him on Opportunities for Presidential Leadership.³

Recommendation

That the attached memo be sent to the President.

Presidential Foreign Policy Speeches

It is important to build on the favorable reception at home and abroad of your Press Club speech. Your personal presentation is an irreplaceable asset in defining and defending your foreign policy. We know it is necessary not to waste that asset, but to apply it only to the most essential tasks. Here is a description of the three Presidential speeches recommended in my recent memo on Presidential opportunities.

1) Speech on American Values and Foreign Policy

Among our allies, a growing body of opinion sees no moral difference between East and West. At home, we are accused of abandoning traditional American moral concerns for power politics. Leaving these perceptions uncorrected not only swells allied and domestic opposition to your policies (e.g., INFs, El Salvador), but wastes our opportunities for attracting allied and bipartisan support. Only you can most effectively emphasize the moral components of our efforts and try to build allied support and domestic bipartisan foreign policy consensus on that basis.

It is generally recognized that your Administration's domestic policies represent a restoration of traditional American ideals. This must be made clear in foreign policy as well. Such a speech would emphasize both your appreciation of the traditionally peace-loving character of the American people and your dedication to the principles of individual rights and dignity that this nation was founded on and that unite the West.

Fuller description in Attachment 1.⁶

⁵ Confidential. Printed from an uninitialed copy. In Wolfowitz's December 15 covering memorandum attached to Haig's undated memorandum to the President, Wolfowitz informed Haig that he had "removed requests for Presidential speeches. You need to make some early decisions about which Presidential speeches are your highest priorities, but this memo is probably not the vehicle to do so. We (along with EUR) have given you a separate memo on Presidential speeches and Tom Enders has also spoken to you on the subject." ⁶ Attached but not printed is an undated paper entitled, "Speech on American Values and Foreign Policy."

2) Speech on Foreign Assistance

Time and again this year we have felt the sting of inadequate foreign assistance resources. In the aftermath of Sadat's assassination⁷ we wanted to reassure friends against radical and proxy threats, but were unable to provide more than token support. Moreover, as a result of stockpile limitations and other resource constraints, the help we give is often poorly tailored to meet the threat. This is not only embarrassing for a great power, but positively dangerous at a time when our security hinges on enhancing the strength of friendly countries in vital parts of the world.

As our economic position improves we will have to devote more resources to foreign assistance. For this some groundwork must be laid. But now substantial efforts are required simply to secure Congressional support for the very lean request we are preparing. To succeed on the Hill, we must diminish public skepticism about foreign assistance—by explaining what assistance consists of, where it goes, and the concrete national security interests it serves.

When I was supporting your foreign assistance program before the House Republican Conference the other day, members stressed how much an explicit Presidential imprimatur can lessen their political burdens.⁸

Fuller description in Attachment 2.⁹

3) Speech on Regional Conflicts

This speech would show that the peace issue is ours as regards not only arms control, but regional conflicts as well. It would address the criticism that we are blinded to regional complexities by our East/West focus and capitalize on the real progress we are making in several regions. It could emphasize diplomatic activity and defuse the claim that our solutions are exclusively military. Unlike a speech on one region, it would indicate we have a general approach.

The timing could be keyed to progress on the Sinai, autonomy, and/or Namibia.

Admiral Nance opened the discussion by quoting from NSDD-5, in which the President stated that conventional arms transfers are a vital component of our foreign policy and an important complement to our defense policy.² He noted that the security assistance budget, which undergirds arms transfers, has fallen from 10% to 2% the size of the defense budget in outlay terms since the late 1950s. What was needed at this time was reconfirmation of the importance of security assistance as a national security instrument. There currently exists a $1.1 billion difference between the State request and the ceiling established by OMB. If we stick to the OMB mark, we need to decide where cuts must occur; if we stick to the State mark, we must determine where the additional money above the ceiling is to be found.

The President stated that he met yesterday with Republican Congressmen who were inclined to vote against foreign aid.³ He said that he, too, had spoken out against foreign aid that is merely a “give-away” or “rat hole.” However, he stressed to these Congressmen the fact that the security assistance component of the foreign assistance budget is vital to our national security, and he sought their support for the FY 82 request at its enhanced level. He noted that he often speaks to foreign leaders about assistance that the U.S. might provide in military terms, and he told the Congressmen that he must have adequate resources to respond appropriately during these conversations. Thus, as he looks at this budget, he will try to determine how much of it is “give-away” foreign aid and how much is in fact vital to our national interest.

Admiral Nance interjected that not all of the $1.1 billion difference between State and OMB was in security assistance, and he asked Under Secretary Buckley to describe the overall budget to the President.

Under Secretary Buckley said that about two-thirds of the FY 83 request is for security assistance, all of which had been targeted to specific programs of interest to the U.S. Twenty-two percent of the budget is in the form of bilateral aid, half of which is targeted to countries in which we have strong security interests.

Mr. McPherson stressed that we have been very careful with this year’s foreign aid request and have tried to eliminate unnecessary programs wherever possible. He noted that there is a security orientation even for development assistance.

² Reference is to NSDD 5, “Conventional Arms Transfer Policy,” issued on July 8. It is scheduled for publication in Foreign Relations, 1981–1988, vol. XL, Global Issues I.

³ The President met with members of the “Core Group”—members of the House of Representatives who endorsed the President’s candidacy—in the Cabinet Room on December 7, from 4:47 until 5:40 p.m. (Reagan Library, President’s Daily Diary)

Under Secretary Buckley then sketched the consequences of a budget at the OMB level, describing in detail the countries and programs that would be adversely affected by the lower level.

Secretary Haig remarked that the budget situation was even more skewed than it appeared, since the majority of funds are going to Israel, Egypt and the base rights countries, and while Congress makes annual cuts, it always leaves the Israeli program intact or enhanced. Thus, it is the "little guys" with whom the President has met who suffer most from an austere budget. He had been on the Hill today talking to Republican House members,⁴ and the chances for averting a disaster on the FY 82 budget are slim. He remarked that State had taken all the cuts that OMB had mandated throughout the year. He also noted that, in the FY 83 budget, a $400 million difference exists on the State authorization, and the lower level would require closing 40 installations, some of which are important to CIA and Defense requirements. On security assistance, he noted that we are talking about only a decimal point of the Defense budget and, in his view, $2 billion in security assistance buys more than does $10 billion in the Defense budget. In sum, he said that we appeared to be losing our sense of balance and that we risk gutting the President's foreign policy by not allocating adequate resources that are carefully tailored to meeting foreign policy objectives. As an example of careful tailoring, he called attention to the fact that we are cutting IDA from 23% to 14%.

Mr. Stockman said that the central issue was the ceiling under which he was operating, a planning ceiling that the President had approved in September for all agencies. Either the ceiling is wrong or the agency request is too high, and without resolving this fundamental question, we will in effect have no budget process whatever on foreign assistance. He noted that most of these programs are slow-spending and that, while there is a major difference this year, the gap will grow even wider in future years. He stated that while he recognized the pressures on the State budget, it must be realized that we are looking at a 16% increase in FY 83, 18% in FY 84, and 12% in FY 85. Thus, we are faced with changing the ceiling or changing priorities to meet legitimate security assistance needs. He also remarked that in addition to the difference in the FY 83 budget outlay figures, there is also a considerable difference in the off-budget account, as well as a $1 billion supplemental planned for FY 82 to cover Polish and Caribbean initiatives. In sum, he stated that we face a major budgetary difference, one that cannot be resolved simply by making changes at the margin.

Secretary Haig agreed that the difference is fundamental, but he noted that excessive rigidity now will make adjustment even more difficult later in the year when unforeseen contingencies may arise. He remarked that he was not happy with what happened this year when the State Department tried to play ball and in effect got double-dipped for cuts during the budget process.

The President interjected that he had just finished a major budget overview session prior to the NSC meeting, and that the table was still warm because of the heated discussion during that session.⁵

Secretary Haig remarked that today had also been difficult for him, since he was on the Hill speaking to House members when word of the increased budget deficit leaked out.

The Vice President then asked when we needed to decide the FY 83 security assistance question.

Mr. Meese replied that we did not need to decide the question at this meeting. Rather, it had been raised as an NSC agenda item so that the question could be viewed in policy as well as budgetary terms. He also thought it important for members of the NSC to have a better idea of requirements down the road because of the budget stringencies we face. He remarked that because of major differences that exist and will exist, we might need to consider more carefully the notion of contingency funding.

Secretary Haig reminded the President that unless we secure passage of the FY 82 budget in its current form, we will face a major backlog in a number of critical accounts, including Egypt.

Mr. Stockman responded that it is difficult for him to understand how we can come in with a budget request in FY 83 40% higher than the FY 82 budget for which Congressional approval looks risky at best.

Deputy Secretary Carlucci said that he agreed with Secretary Haig about the importance of the security assistance budget and noted that this budget “carries the freight” for us during our important base negotiations.

Admiral Hayward said that the Joint Chiefs of Staff did not wish to get into specific numbers, but they would like to support the basic policy arguments made by Secretary Haig and Deputy Secretary Carlucci. He noted, in fact, that if anything the JCS believed the program, even at the State level, is underfunded.

Secretary Haig noted that we also have a problem with extremely high interest rates on FMS loans. He said that it is incongruous to go to financially strapped countries in the Caribbean with offers of military equipment at a 16% interest rate.

⁵In his personal diary entry for December 8, the President wrote: “A full day. First a meeting to hear the 1st 1983 budget review. We who were going to balance the budget face the biggest budget deficits ever. And yet percentage wise they’ll be smaller in relation to G.N.P. We have reduced Carter’s 17% spending increase to 9%. The recession has added to costs & reduced revenues however so even with that reduction in govts. size we face a large deficit.” (Brinkley, ed., The Reagan Diaries, vol. I, January 1981–October 1985, p. 90)

Deputy Secretary Carlucci noted that the rate is now down to about 13%, but that was still too high for most countries, including important Mideast countries like Tunisia.

The President remarked that King Hussein told him that one reason he intended to buy Russian air defense missiles was that they were one-third the cost of those available from the U.S.

Secretary Haig said that we must bear in mind that, in the security assistance field, we are picking up the pieces from the Carter Administration's policy that was prejudiced against arms sales.

Secretary Regan said that he agreed with Secretary Haig, particularly insofar as excessively high interest rates are concerned.

Deputy Secretary Carlucci then noted that the security assistance budget helps to fund arms sales that themselves keep the defense production base warm.

The President replied that he understood that point.

Mr. Meese then asked whether there were any place in the budget to come up with additional funds, perhaps in the form of contingency funds.

Mr. Stockman replied that there were programs that could be cut, but not enough to make up for the major difference that now exists. He noted, for instance, that there is $200 million in aid allocated for OPEC countries, and that on the MDBs, we appear to be heading toward the Carter level in the next round of negotiations.

Mr. McPherson interjected that most of the money for OPEC countries was intended for specific programs, such as population control, in Indonesia and Ecuador.

Under Secretary Buckley noted that the budget proposes a $75 million ESF contingency fund and a $50 million contingency for the Caribbean Basin Initiative, both of which are too small.

The President then asked the amount of the IDCA check that Mr. McPherson had presented to him earlier in the year.

Mr. McPherson replied that it was for $28 million.

Mr. Meese then stated that the policy question had been well presented, and it was now time for OMB to make its decisions against the backdrop. Further issues can be raised after the initial OMB decisions have been made.

Mr. Stockman replied that he cannot go higher than the ceilings that were approved in September. Thus, it will be difficult to make adjustments on a program-by-program basis, and that, even with adjustments, the results may not be satisfactory to Secretary Haig. He thus recommended that we review the planning ceiling, then go through the pass-back exercise, or else we would arrive again at a stalemate.

Secretary Haig responded that we are already at a crisis point, that we cannot meet the President's foreign policy commitments at the projected levels. He also noted that Congress would not let the State Department close 40 installations, and thus adjustments were also necessary in the State budget.

Mr. Stockman interjected that OMB had worked hard to help hold to State's FY 82 level during Congressional considerations, in spite of the fact that many Congressmen wanted major cuts, including some from the State budget.

Admiral Nance summarized for the President by noting that this meeting was not intended to produce a decision, but rather to provide the President the necessary information on this major policy question. It should now be clear to the President that a major problem does exist and will have to be addressed later.

The President ended the meeting by stating that he had learned quite a bit, perhaps more than he could use at this point, and that he was prepared to revisit this issue in the future.

danger." This memorandum highlights dangers we face, identifies areas where we need your help, and notes opportunities for you to advance U.S. interests in the coming year.

The success of our policies depends primarily on your leadership and involvement. However, we will bear in mind the importance of your domestic program and will seek your aid only on vital matters.

I. Western Unity and Relations with the Soviet Union

The dramatic events still unfolding in Poland² are likely to have strong and unpredictable effects on our relations with our allies and the Soviets. Regardless of the outcome of the Polish crisis, three other issues will be of great importance to Western unity and East-West relations.

The peace issue must be ours and be met head on. Your Press Club speech³ has put the Russians on the defensive, but we must build on that foundation in the Geneva INF talks⁴ and with an early announcement of a new approach on START.⁵ We should also continue to focus European attention on Soviet actions in Afghanistan. Upcoming political hurdles include the German SPD Party Congress next April and the start of site construction for our new INF deployments.

Growing tensions arising from the economic problems faced by every industrialized country could become a serious threat to the unity of the Western alliance.

Finally, the United States itself does not yet have a policy that provides effective leverage over the Soviet Union through trade and technology transfer, much less a policy for the Western allies as a whole.

Where We Need Your Help

We will need decisions from you on a position for opening START negotiations early next year and on East-West trade policy.

Presidential leadership will be needed on Poland. The Soviets must not mistake our resolve, nor should the deeply anti-Soviet Polish experiment fail for want of American understanding of the significance of the new situation.

A trip by you to key Western European capitals next spring, built around the Paris Economic Summit⁶ or a special NATO summit, preferably both, would permit you to promote better understanding of our policies and ease political pressures on Allied leaders.

² Reference is to the imposition of martial law in Poland on December 13, as well as the earlier action by the Government of Poland to disband Solidarity and the ongoing humanitarian crisis.

At Paris, you might also launch an “Industrial Democracies Economic Action Program” that would combine public and private efforts to solve reindustrialization, productivity, energy and development problems.

II. Financial Resources, Trade and Development

We cannot run a first-class foreign policy with second-class resources. A healthy U.S. economy is the best solution. However, we urgently need resources even before our economic problems are solved.

Our defense and foreign assistance programs must pass if we are to maintain our credibility in Soviet eyes, help our friends resist Soviet pressures, increase U.S. political influence in the developing world, and carry out both the Caribbean Basin Initiative and the development policy that you set forth at Cancun. In addition, the Department’s own resources have been seriously constrained for several years. We are in danger of losing the vital capacity to represent our nation’s interests effectively and report and analyze developments abroad.

The Administration’s defense and foreign assistance programs both face difficult Congressional opposition. Conservatives in general and Republicans in particular oppose foreign assistance almost as a reflex action. The Democrats will work to embarrass us, as they did with the attempted foreign assistance cut in the Continuing Resolution that you brilliantly vetoed.⁷ The preferable legislation subsequently passed confirms again that strong presidential leadership greatly increases our leverage.

We anticipate rising protectionist pressures that could threaten your Caribbean Basin Initiative and your program to promote development through freer trade, as well as our relations with our industrial allies.

⁷ Presumable reference to the President’s veto of H.J. Res. 357, the continuing resolution providing appropriations for FY 1982, on November 23, which led to a temporary shutdown of the federal government. On November 24, Congress passed and Reagan signed a short-term spending bill, authorizing expenditures through December 15. (Lee Lescaze, “Federal Shutdown Ends as Reagan, Hill Agree,” Washington Post, November 24, 1981, pp. A1, A7) The House and Senate approved a revised version of the resolution—H.J. Res. 370—on December 10 and 11, respectively. The President signed P.L. 97–92 (95 Stat. 1183), which authorized additional continuing appropriations for FY 1982, into law on December 15. (Congress and the Nation, vol. VI, 1981–1984, p. 45) At the December 15 signing ceremony, Reagan indicated that the continuing resolution provided appropriations for “most of the government” through March 31, 1982. He noted his preference for separate appropriations bills, adding, “But the continuing resolution I’m signing today is far better than those of recent years and better than the one I vetoed 3 weeks ago.” (Public Papers: Reagan, 1981, p. 1156)

Where We Need Your Help (continued)

Only you can persuade our political allies that a Reagan foreign policy requires Reagan budgets and Reagan legislation.

We will also be coming to you soon for decisions to flesh out the 4-point approach you presented at Cancun, in order to maintain the initiative and keep control of the world economic dialogue.

You could demonstrate your personal support for free and open international trade by publicly participating in preparations for next fall's Ministerial Meeting of the GATT.⁸

III. Regional Trouble Spots

No region has so many obvious dangers, from Iran to Morocco, as the Middle East-Persian Gulf. The next six months will be crucial for our entire position in the Middle East as we pursue our interdependent goals of peace and security.

Your decision to commit U.S. forces to the Sinai Peace-keeping Force looks particularly farsighted today.⁹ It has become the key to assuring Israeli withdrawal from the Sinai and Egyptian fidelity to the Camp David Accords thereafter.

We will also be working hard to reach an agreement on autonomy for the West Bank and Gaza, before April if possible, but continuing beyond then if necessary. The difficulties posed by Begin's recent annexation of the Golan Heights clearly indicate the problems we are going to face.¹⁰

Effective action against the destabilizing efforts of radical forces will be important to our credibility. Containing Qadhafi's program of aggression and terrorism will be particularly important.

Southern Africa offers increasing hope for diplomatic success in 1982. By next spring or summer, we hope to have the elements of a Namibian settlement in place, but we could face a stalemate over the issue of Cuban withdrawals from Angola and the related question of Savimbi's role.

China. Over the next few months, we need to make some decisions to meet our important commitments to Taiwan's security while ensuring that our strategic association with China does not suffer an historic and politically costly reversal.

¹⁰ Reference is to the Knesset's December 14 vote to annex the Golan Heights and extend Israel's "law, jurisdiction, and administration" to the area held under military occupation since the 1967 Arab-Israeli war. Shipler, "The Golan Heights Annexed By Israel in an Abrupt Move: Begin Pushes the Legislation Through Parliament—U.S. Criticizes the Action," New York Times, December 15, 1981, pp. A1, A12)

Central America/Caribbean. The picture in our own hemisphere is dark. El Salvador is threatened; Nicaragua is arming to the teeth and solidifying totalitarian rule; democratic governments in Costa Rica, Jamaica and the Dominican Republic face serious economic problems; and destabilization is beginning in Guatemala and Honduras. As you have already concluded we vitally need $250–300 million in supplemental assistance for the Caribbean Basin program and special additional efforts in El Salvador and Honduras to restrain these trends.

In the Middle East, your continuing personal involvement might be needed to complete the return of the Sinai to Egypt, which will be a major triumph for Reagan foreign policy. We will need your help in our continuing efforts to prevent war in Lebanon. You may want to be involved personally if the autonomy negotiations appear close to successful conclusion. Finally, once Americans have withdrawn from Libya, we will need some decision from you on a long-term policy for dealing with Qadhafi.

Securing peace in Southern Africa, including a Cuban withdrawal from Angola, would be a major achievement. Your help may be needed to maintain public and allied support for our policy or to clinch the deal with South Africa.

As to China, we must make clear to Peking that this Administration is committed to a one-China policy and supports a process of gradual peaceful reconciliation, but that we also will fulfill our long-term defense commitments to Taiwan under the Taiwan Relations Act in a prudent fashion, particularly on the difficult issue of aircraft replacement.¹¹

We will need your personal intervention to persuade the Congress and the public of the vital importance of supplemental assistance for Central America and the Caribbean.

Conclusion

This is what I expect to be asking of you in the coming year. If we can plan on your support, we can make some major gains that will strengthen the country and your leadership and lay a strong basis for our diplomacy through the remainder of the first Reagan Administration.

75. Memorandum From the Executive Secretary of the Department of State (Bremer) to Secretary of State Haig¹

Diplomats, like generals, tend to prepare for the last war. For decades, we have dedicated our energies (successfully) to averting World War II—detering an aggressive nation in the heart of Europe bent on conquest. A far more troubling model we think too little about is the slide into World War I, where countries failed to define, understand and communicate clearly their respective national interests until it was too late.

Today we are in that stage of crisis when the premium should be on a clear, precise and cold-eyed analysis of the U.S. interests and objectives in Poland. What exactly do we seek out of the crisis?² What are the indicators of an acceptable outcome (i.e., must Solidarity return as a significant political force or is it sufficient for U.S. objectives that it be a vigorous trade union? What role do we see for the Church? For the Army? For the Party?) We need to think and speak very clearly about these matters, for only when the government's high councils have agreed on U.S. objectives is there any chance of agreeing on courses of action designed to forward our objectives.³

We should also demand of ourselves and our decision-makers the same degree of analysis about likely Soviet objectives. That Russia's vital interests are at stake in Poland is incontestable.⁴ Whether for reasons of preserving the fiction of Party supremacy or as a recognition of the iron grip of geography, no one who rules in Moscow can be indifferent to what happens in Warsaw. Whatever the crisis is for us, therefore, we should be under no illusions: it is an issue of war or peace for the Kremlin.⁵ Empires don't as a rule commit suicide. They fight.⁶

Secondly we are at the phase in this crisis where discipline of thought must be matched by discipline of action. We cannot afford to have different voices in the Administration signaling differently to the American people; the Poles, the Soviets and the Allies (unless we do so intentionally as part of our strategy).⁷ Crisis management in this administration particularly must have as one of its highest priorities reasserting the central control by the President over our public posture.

Finally, we need to remember the desirability of keeping the President's options open. Incautious actions today—or even actions which today seem appropriate—may well tie his hands in two days or two weeks.⁸ As we move down the path, we need constantly to ask ourselves where each step will leave us, not just tomorrow, but the day after. The process is dynamic; so must our strategy be.

⁷ Haig highlighted this and the previous sentence. He also underlined the portion of this sentence beginning with “differently” and ending with “strategy.”

76. Address by President Reagan to the Nation¹

Washington, December 23, 1981

Address to the Nation About Christmas and the Situation in Poland

Good evening.

At Christmas time, every home takes on a special beauty, a special warmth, and that's certainly true of the White House, where so many famous Americans have spent their Christmases over the years. This fine old home, the people's house, has seen so much, been so much a part of all our lives and history. It's been humbling and inspiring for Nancy and me to be spending our first Christmas in this place.

¹ Source: Public Papers: Reagan, 1981, pp. 1185–1188. All brackets are in the original. The President spoke at 9 p.m. from the Oval Office. His remarks were broadcast live on nationwide radio and television networks. The Department provided the text of questions and answers prepared for a backgrounder delivered before the President's address to all diplomatic posts, the International Communication Agency, and the Department of Defense in telegram 339577, December 24. (Department of State, Central Foreign Policy File, Electronic Telegrams, D810613–0115) In his personal diary entry for December 23, the President noted: “Speech went OK—about 14 minutes. First 1/2 hour calls at W.H. running about 6 to 1 in favor.” (Brinkley, ed., The Reagan Diaries, vol. I, January 1981–October 1985, p. 96)

We've lived here as your tenants for almost a year now, and what a year it's been. As a people we've been through quite a lot—moments of joy, of tragedy, and of real achievement—moments that I believe have brought us all closer together. G. K. Chesterton once said that the world would never starve for wonders, but only for the want of wonder.

At this special time of year, we all renew our sense of wonder in recalling the story of the first Christmas in Bethlehem, nearly 2,000 years ago.

Some celebrate Christmas as the birthday of a great and good philosopher and teacher. Others of us believe in the divinity of the child born in Bethlehem, that he was and is the promised Prince of Peace. Yes, we've questioned why he who could perform miracles chose to come among us as a helpless babe, but maybe that was his first miracle, his first great lesson that we should learn to care for one another.

Tonight, in millions of American homes, the glow of the Christmas tree is a reflection of the love Jesus taught us. Like the shepherds and wise men of that first Christmas, we Americans have always tried to follow a higher light, a star, if you will. At lonely campfire vigils along the frontier, in the darkest days of the Great Depression, through war and peace, the twin beacons of faith and freedom have brightened the American sky. At times our footsteps may have faltered, but trusting in God's help, we've never lost our way.

Just across the way from the White House stand the two great emblems of the holiday season: a Menorah, symbolizing the Jewish festival of Hanukkah, and the National Christmas Tree, a beautiful towering blue spruce from Pennsylvania. Like the National Christmas Tree, our country is a living, growing thing planted in rich American soil. Only our devoted care can bring it to full flower. So, let this holiday season be for us a time of rededication.

Even as we rejoice, however, let us remember that for some Americans, this will not be as happy a Christmas as it should be. I know a little of what they feel. I remember one Christmas Eve during the Great Depression, my father opening what he thought was a Christmas greeting. It was a notice that he no longer had a job.

Over the past year, we've begun the long, hard work of economic recovery. Our goal is an America in which every citizen who needs and wants a job can get a job. Our program for recovery has only been in place for 12 weeks now, but it is beginning to work. With your help and prayers, it will succeed. We're winning the battle against inflation, runaway government spending and taxation, and that victory will mean more economic growth, more jobs, and more opportunity for all Americans.

A few months before he took up residence in this house, one of my predecessors, John Kennedy, tried to sum up the temper of the times with a quote from an author closely tied to Christmas, Charles Dickens. We were living, he said, in the best of times and the worst of times. Well, in some ways that's even more true today. The world is full of peril, as well as promise. Too many of its people, even now, live in the shadow of want and tyranny.

As I speak to you tonight, the fate of a proud and ancient nation hangs in the balance. For a thousand years, Christmas has been celebrated in Poland, a land of deep religious faith, but this Christmas brings little joy to the courageous Polish people. They have been betrayed by their own government.

The men who rule them and their totalitarian allies fear the very freedom that the Polish people cherish. They have answered the stirrings of liberty with brute force, killings, mass arrests, and the setting up of concentration camps. Lech Walesa and other Solidarity leaders are imprisoned, their fate unknown. Factories, mines, universities, and homes have been assaulted.

The Polish Government has trampled underfoot solemn commitments to the UN Charter and the Helsinki accords.² It has even broken the Gdansk agreement of August 1980, by which the Polish Government recognized the basic right of its people to form free trade unions and to strike.

The tragic events now occurring in Poland, almost 2 years to the day after the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, have been precipitated by public and secret pressure from the Soviet Union. It is no coincidence that Soviet Marshal Kulikov, chief of the Warsaw Pact forces, and other senior Red Army officers were in Poland while these outrages were being initiated. And it is no coincidence that the martial law proclamations imposed in December by the Polish Government were being printed in the Soviet Union in September.³

The target of this depression [repression] is the Solidarity Movement, but in attacking Solidarity its enemies attack an entire people. Ten million of Poland's 36 million citizens are members of Solidarity. Taken together with their families, they account for the overwhelming majority of the Polish nation. By persecuting Solidarity the Polish Government wages war against its own people.

I urge the Polish Government and its allies to consider the consequences of their actions. How can they possibly justify using naked force to crush a people who ask for nothing more than the right to lead their own lives in freedom and dignity? Brute force may intimidate, but it cannot form the basis of an enduring society, and the ailing Polish economy cannot be rebuilt with terror tactics.

Poland needs cooperation between its government and its people, not military oppression. If the Polish Government will honor the commitments it has made to human rights in documents like the Gdansk agreement, we in America will gladly do our share to help the shattered Polish economy, just as we helped the countries of Europe after both World Wars.

It's ironic that we offered, and Poland expressed interest in accepting, our help after World War II. The Soviet Union intervened then and refused to allow such help to Poland. But if the forces of tyranny in Poland, and those who incite them from without, do not relent, they should prepare themselves for serious consequences. Already, throughout the Free World, citizens have publicly demonstrated their support for the Polish people. Our government, and those of our allies, have expressed moral revulsion at the police state tactics of Poland's oppressors. The Church has also spoken out, in spite of threats and intimidation. But our reaction cannot stop there.

I want emphatically to state tonight that if the outrages in Poland do not cease, we cannot and will not conduct "business as usual" with the perpetrators and those who aid and abet them. Make no mistake, their crime will cost them dearly in their future dealings with America and free peoples everywhere. I do not make this statement lightly or without serious reflection.

We have been measured and deliberate in our reaction to the tragic events in Poland. We have not acted in haste, and the steps I will outline tonight and others we may take in the days ahead are firm, just, and reasonable.

In order to aid the suffering Polish people during this critical period, we will continue the shipment of food through private humanitarian channels, but only so long as we know that the Polish people themselves receive the food.⁴ The neighboring country of Austria has opened her doors to refugees from Poland. I have therefore directed that American assistance, including supplies of basic foodstuffs, be offered to aid the Austrians in providing for these refugees.

But to underscore our fundamental opposition to the repressive actions taken by the Polish Government against its own people, the administration has suspended all government-sponsored shipments of agricultural and dairy products to the Polish Government.⁵ This suspension will remain in force until absolute assurances are received that distribution of these products is monitored and guaranteed by independent agencies. We must be sure that every bit of food provided by America goes to the Polish people, not to their oppressors.

The United States is taking immediate action to suspend major elements of our economic relationships with the Polish Government. We have halted the renewal of the Export-Import Bank's line of export credit insurance to the Polish Government. We will suspend Polish civil aviation privileges in the United States. We are suspending the right of Poland's fishing fleet to operate in American waters. And we're proposing to our allies the further restriction of high technology exports to Poland.

These actions are not directed against the Polish people. They are a warning to the Government of Poland that free men cannot and will not stand idly by in the face of brutal repression. To underscore this point, I've written a letter to General Jaruzelski, head of the Polish Government. In it, I outlined the steps we're taking and warned of the serious consequences if the Polish Government continues to use violence against its populace.⁶ I've urged him to free those in arbitrary detention, to lift martial law, and to restore the internationally recognized rights of the Polish people to free speech and association.

The Soviet Union, through its threats and pressures, deserves a major share of blame for the developments in Poland. So, I have also sent a letter to President Brezhnev urging him to permit the restoration of basic human rights in Poland provided for in the Helsinki Final Act.⁷ In it, I informed him that if this repression continues, the United States will have no choice but to take further concrete political and economic measures affecting our relationship.

⁵On December 14, the administration announced the suspension of economic assistance to the Government of Poland, following the imposition of martial law on December 13. Haig, en route to the United States from Europe, indicated that the administration would permit the continued shipment of P.L.-480 commodities under the auspices of charities such as CARE and CRS. New York Times reporter Hedrick Smith wrote: "Food and humanitarian relief already in the pipeline will proceed," Mr. Haig said. "But at a time like this, we are going to hold in abeyance decisions to further aid the Government of Poland until the situation is clarified." (Hedrick Smith, "Further U.S. Help Is in Abeyance Until Polish Situation Is Clarified," New York Times, December 15, 1981, pp. A1, A19)

When 19th century Polish patriots rose against foreign oppressors, their rallying cry was, "For our freedom and yours." Well, that motto still rings true in our time. There is a spirit of solidarity abroad in the world tonight that no physical force can crush. It crosses national boundaries and enters into the hearts of men and women everywhere. In factories, farms, and schools, in cities and towns around the globe, we the people of the Free World stand as one with our Polish brothers and sisters. Their cause is ours, and our prayers and hopes go out to them this Christmas.

Yesterday, I met in this very room with Romuald Spasowski, the distinguished former Polish Ambassador who has sought asylum in our country in protest of the suppression of his native land.⁸ He told me that one of the ways the Polish people have demonstrated their solidarity in the face of martial law is by placing lighted candles in their windows to show that the light of liberty still glows in their hearts.

Ambassador Spasowski requested that on Christmas Eve a lighted candle will burn in the White House window as a small but certain beacon of our solidarity with the Polish people.⁹ I urge all of you to do the same tomorrow night, on Christmas Eve, as a personal statement of your commitment to the steps we're taking to support the brave people of Poland in their time of troubles.

Once, earlier in this century, an evil influence threatened that the lights were going out all over the world. Let the light of millions of candles in American homes give notice that the light of freedom is not going to be extinguished. We are blessed with a freedom and abundance denied to so many. Let those candles remind us that these blessings

⁹ On December 24, at 4:30 p.m., Reagan lit a candle and placed it in one of the windows of the White House. New York Times reporter Judith Miller wrote that Brzezinski "said today that he had proposed the idea to Mr. Spasowski shortly before the diplomat's meeting with Mr. Reagan. However, he noted the concept was initially proposed Monday [December 21], at a lunch with his former staff members by Robert Hunter, who was a specialist on the Middle East for the National Security Council." (Judith Miller, "Birth of a Light For Poland," New York Times, December 25, 1981, p. 1) bring with them a solid obligation, an obligation to the God who guides us, an obligation to the heritage of liberty and dignity handed down to us by our forefathers and an obligation to the children of the world, whose future will be shaped by the way we live our lives today.

Christmas means so much because of one special child. But Christmas also reminds us that all children are special, that they are gifts from God, gifts beyond price that mean more than any presents money can buy. In their love and laughter, in our hopes for their future lies the true meaning of Christmas.

So, in a spirit of gratitude for what we've been able to achieve together over the past year and looking forward to all that we hope to achieve together in the years ahead, Nancy and I want to wish you all the best of holiday seasons. As Charles Dickens, whom I quoted a few moments ago, said so well in "A Christmas Carol," "God bless us, every one."

Good night.

77. Memorandum From Secretary of State Haig to President Reagan¹

Washington, January 11, 1982

SUBJECT

U.S. Foreign Policy in 1982

Despite some unnecessary bumps, and some inherited shocks, I think we got off to a moderately good start in 1981. We placed foreign policy on a new footing, one based less on negotiation per se than on an approach comprising a U.S. effort to rebuild its economic and military strength and close cooperation with key friends and allies. Moreover, we have put Moscow on notice that Soviet and Soviet-proxy behavior which challenged world order would not go without response. In particular, we can point to an appreciably increased defense budget,² security assistance legislation after a three-year drought,³ a positive vote on AWACS,⁴ a major (if tenuous) diplomatic achievement in Lebanon,⁵ and a new relationship with Pakistan—each required considerable effort, and each represented measurable progress.⁶

The purpose of this memorandum, however, is to look forward. It will examine the major strategic challenges we are likely to face in 1982, and point out what we are likely to have to do to meet them. It goes without saying that events in Poland—and our response to them—could alter much of the following.

Alliances: No single dimension of foreign policy will be as critical as our ability to manage our alliances. Central to this will be our relationship with Bonn, and with Schmidt in particular. Avoiding a major rift, while working to restore U.S. leadership within our alliances, must be a major, even often an overriding, goal. Poland could offer us a major opportunity if we handle it right. A serious falling out would not only distract us from our efforts to restore the strength and self-confidence of our alliances, but it would leave us ill-prepared to meet crises around the world at a time of adverse strategic trends.

Our era is not one in which the United States often can act alone to protect the peace. We no longer enjoy the economic, political, and military pre-eminence we did after World War II. To accomplish the far-reaching goals we have set for ourselves, we must have the active cooperation of our friends. As a result, we must not forsake “multilateralism” for “unilateralism.” Notwithstanding the latter’s attractions, increased unilateralism on our part will only exacerbate strains within our alliances, leading to their decay and to the demise of the order our alliances foster. The freedom of action and the ideological purity of unilateralism will no doubt attract adherents, and in certain crises there may be no alternative to our acting independently; as a general rule, though, we ought to continue to resist this nostalgic impulse.

In Europe, the principal requirement is to manage relations so that our INF deployment goes ahead as planned and that we avoid a Carter-style neutron bomb fiasco.⁷ The consensus in Europe to proceed remains fragile; our formulation of a more realistic relationship between arms control and defense policy is not widely shared on the Continent. We have captured the imagination of Europe by your proposal to eliminate U.S. and Soviet INF missiles, but disenchantment could build if there is no major progress towards an INF agreement.⁸ Because lack of progress will lead many in Europe to see the United States with its pristine zero option—and not the USSR—as the obstacle to arms control, we must retain flexibility in these talks and negotiate in good faith. Moreover, we must not only be careful in how we handle INF directly, but also in our dealings with issues (Poland, ERW, chemical modernization, START) which could affect public opinion and political will in Europe.

Similarly, and if Poland does not worsen, we must introduce a START position that is sufficiently fair and simple so that it can be readily understood by Western publics. There is an important distinction between INF and START, however. The prospects for realizing an INF agreement in the near term are dim; the balance of forces is so unequal that despite all the political will on our side the objective preconditions for an agreement could well be absent. By contrast, in START, the balance of relevant forces is such that the chances for a treaty are considerably higher, despite the great momentum of Soviet strategic programs.

The Middle East: True to its history, the Middle East continues to pose the greatest threat to peace. We could face a war in Lebanon, further clashes with Begin, and an autonomy process under Camp David which, in the absence of substantial progress before April, will be in grave trouble. As you know, I will soon be in Israel and Egypt to determine what can be done to foster the autonomy arrangements.⁹ Despite our best efforts, however, the prospects of realizing any substantial progress on autonomy early in 1982 are relatively small. We will also continue to disagree with our allies over policy towards this region. This should prove manageable (as it has been since the 1973 war) but could nevertheless grow more difficult as the year wears on.

The key factor will likely be our relationship with Israel. Begin is politically safe, in 1982 and beyond. With him in office, it will be difficult to make progress on the Palestinian question. We should not shy away from a political confrontation over how to proceed, but we should try to ensure that it is the U.S., and not Israel, which chooses the subject and timing of any clash. In so doing, it will be important that we be willing to assume a higher profile in the peace process.

Southwest Asia: With AWACS behind us, Iran still unsettled (although unlikely to disintegrate in 1982), and with the results of recent defense budgets beginning to emerge, we ought to move our Southwest Asia

⁹ Haig was in Cairo, January 12–14, and Jerusalem, January 14–15, to discuss the peace process with Mubarak and Begin, respectively. He returned to Jerusalem, January 27–28, and Cairo, January 28–29, to discuss prospects for Palestinian autonomy talks with Israeli and Egyptian officials, respectively. strategy from the realm of rhetoric to reality. We plan to press firmly for host nation support in Saudi Arabia, Egypt, Oman, and, to the extent possible, in Turkey and Pakistan. We should also protect those defense dollars dedicated to making the Rapid Deployment Force viable. In short, we must plan and program for the real geopolitical challenge at hand.

Libya: We have succeeded in sensitizing people to the Soviet proxy problem; now we need to follow up our words with actions. We should be willing to go forward with the economic measures planned for Libya if necessary. At the same time, together with other countries or alone, we should continue to prepare to respond to any provocation by Qadhafi.

Central America: 1982 promises to be a turning point for Nicaragua and for much of Central America. Our principal goal should be to frustrate the Sandinistas in their attempt to consolidate power. We should be wary of efforts by the Nicaraguans and their friends to engage us in a "dialogue;" this could hamper our ability to respond vigorously to such developments as Nicaragua's acquisition of a new generation of Soviet aircraft. We should also continue to increase the pressures on Cuba and provide whatever economic and military assistance is needed to keep El Salvador and its neighbors afloat. The Caribbean Basin initiative will be a central element of our approach.

Africa: Our prospects here may be somewhat brighter. A success in Namibia should create major opportunities to improve our relations with Black Africa. Building a security relationship with Nigeria should become an objective. We should also work to strengthen our position in the Horn and in the Maghreb. More pessimistically, instability in Zaire is a real possibility next year, and here, as in many areas, the quality of our bilateral relationship with France will be decisive.

China: It is difficult to exaggerate what is at stake geopolitically in the China tangle. We must make a major effort to deepen US-PRC relations to reassure Beijing that we do not seek a two China policy, and take steps to institutionalize the US-PRC relationship through arms and technology transfers and regular strategic consultations. It is in our national interest to balance the honoring of our commitments to Taiwan with actions intended to further our strategic ties to Beijing.

The Soviet Union: Although our defense efforts may have begun to convince the Soviets that their window of opportunity will prove short-lived, they are unlikely to capitalize on their strategic advantages by challenging us too brazenly. The Soviets already have their hands full in Poland and Afghanistan, are nurturing a peace offensive in Western Europe and a stagnating economy at home, and continue to demonstrate an aversion to risk taking.

On our part, we should approach Moscow against a backdrop of military renewal, mixing consistent and reasonable public statements with frequent, firm and non-pugnacious private messages aimed at convincing Soviet leaders we are prepared to do business if they moderate their actions. At the same time, it may be possible to promote Soviet caution by creating a sense of unpredictability regarding possible U.S. behavior in selected circumstances. Otherwise, our relations with Moscow ought to be determined less by bilateral initiatives than by our overall foreign policy—maintaining alliance cohesion, promoting regional security, challenging Soviet proxies worldwide and the Soviets themselves in Afghanistan, moving closer to China and so on. We should avoid the extremes of too confrontational rhetoric on the one hand and cosmetic summitry on the other.

The most serious near term danger in East/West terms, however, is the Polish crisis. Clearly the Soviets will attempt to manipulate this Marxist failure in such a way that it converges with their already successful efforts to use the peace offensive and Europe's nuclear mania to split us from our Western allies. We already see signs of a sweet/sour approach emerging between Europe and the U.S. respectively. We must also be alert to further strictly anti-U.S. (as distinct from anti-Western) challenges in Cuba and elsewhere designed to neutralize Europe, divert attention from Poland and demonstrate to the world U.S. impotence.

Accomplishing all or even most of the above will require an enormous amount of skill, tenacity, and good fortune. Success is also likely to depend upon three other factors closer to home:

—Budgets: It is clear that government spending will come under pressure, and that defense and security assistance will be prime targets. But we must preserve these programs which provide the foundation for much if not all of what we seek to do. Your help—for example, a speech later this month explaining to the Congress and the American people the critical contribution our economic and security assistance efforts make to U.S. national security worldwide—would prove invaluable.

—The Interagency Process: The emergence of a strengthened and capable NSC staff will prove a major asset, and one which will be welcomed.¹⁰

—Profile: Lastly, there is no substitute for a role that only you can fulfill; namely that of educating the public through speeches and appearances, and building support in Congress for our policies. I look forward to working with you, Cap and Bill Clark in this endeavor.

78. Memorandum From Richard Pipes of the National Security Council Staff to Norman Bailey of the National Security Council Staff¹

Washington, January 15, 1982

SUBJECT

Haig's Memorandum on U.S. Foreign Policy in 1982²

Here, in brief, are my reactions:

1. The section on "Alliances", in my opinion, lays far too much stress on the maintenance of the Alliance system as a "major, even often an overriding, goal" of U.S. foreign policy. The overriding objective of U.S. foreign policy is national security: if the Alliance system fosters this objective, then the Alliance system is valuable; if it hinders it, its utility can be legitimately questioned. Nobody wants unilateralism except as a last resort.

2. The section on "Europe" unmistakably hints at the need to climb down from our "Zero Option" ("we must retain flexibility in these [IMF] talks and negotiate in good faith").³ This approach is quite contrary to our official position, as enunciated by the President. If such an attitude becomes operative, we will be handing the Russians a weapon for sabotaging our negotiating objectives in Geneva.

3. "Middle East": According to this scenario, the main—indeed, only—problem in the Middle East is Israel and its Prime Minister. One might suggest the Arab instability and intransigence, inter-Arab rivalry, Muslim revivalism, and a few phenomena of this nature which have nothing to do with Israel need also to be considered in this context.

³ See Document 69 and footnote 8 thereto.

4. In the discussion of Southwest Asia, the drafters seem to have forgotten that the Russians have invaded Afghanistan and are presently ravaging that country.

5. The part on the Soviet Union lacks serious content. "We are prepared to do business [with the Soviet leaders] if they moderate their behavior" is hardly an inspiring or novel idea: this approach, I recall, has been tried not so long ago under a strategy labelled detente. (S)

SUBJECT

Staffing of Secretary Haig's January 11 Memorandum to the President Entitled "U.S. Foreign Policy in 1982"²

I attach some staff comments on the subject memo. The principal criticisms seem to be along the following lines:

(1) The memorandum follows no general concept of foreign policy or the national interest.

(2) Much of it suffers from meaningless phrasing and circular reasoning.

(3) It seems to grant our allies a quasi-veto over our policies and strategies.

(4) It endorses a form of detente, a discredited foreign policy and not part of this Administration's objectives.

(5) It omits extremely important elements, such as relations with Japan and trade policy.

80. Editorial Note

On January 26, 1982, at 9 p.m., President Ronald Reagan delivered his first State of the Union address before both Houses of Congress. His remarks were broadcast live on nationwide radio and television. After an introduction by Speaker of the House of Representatives Thomas “Tip” O’Neill (D–Massachusetts), the President discussed domestic policy before emphasizing the accomplishments made in the area of foreign relations during 1981: “So far, I’ve concentrated largely, now, on domestic matters. To view the state of the Union in perspective, we must not ignore the rest of the world. There isn’t time tonight for a lengthy treatment of social—or foreign policy, I should say, a subject I intend to address in detail in the near future. A few words, however, are in order on the progress we’ve made over the past year, reestablishing respect for our nation around the globe and some of the challenges and goals that we will approach in the year ahead.

“At Ottawa and Cancun, I met with leaders of the major industrial powers and developing nations. Now, some of those I met with were a little surprised that I didn’t apologize for America’s wealth. Instead, I spoke of the strength of the free market-place system and how that system could help them realize their aspirations for economic development and political freedom. I believe lasting friendships were made, and the foundation was laid for future cooperation.

“In the vital region of the Caribbean Basin, we’re developing a program of aid, trade, and investment incentives to promote self-sustaining growth and a better, more secure life for our neighbors to the south. Toward those who would export terrorism and subversion in the Caribbean and elsewhere, especially Cuba and Libya, we will act with firmness.

“Our foreign policy is a policy of strength, fairness, and balance. By restoring America’s military credibility, by pursuing peace at the negotiating table wherever both sides are willing to sit down in good faith, and by regaining the respect of America’s allies and adversaries alike, we have strengthened our country’s position as a force for peace and progress in the world.

“When action is called for, we’re taking it. Our sanctions against the military dictatorship that has attempted to crush human rights in Poland—and against the Soviet regime behind that military dictatorship—clearly demonstrated to the world that America will not conduct ‘business as usual’ with the forces of oppression. If the events in Poland continue to deteriorate, further measures will follow.

“Now, let me also note that private American groups have taken the lead in making January 30th a day of solidarity with the people of Poland. So, too, the European Parliament has called for March 21st to be an international day of support for Afghanistan. Well, I urge all peace-loving peoples to join together on those days, to raise their voices, to speak and pray for freedom.

“Meanwhile, we’re working for reduction of arms and military activities, as I announced in my address to the Nation last November 18th. We have proposed to the Soviet Union a far-reaching agenda for mutual reduction of military forces and have already initiated negotiations with them in Geneva on intermediate-range nuclear forces. In those talks it is essential that we negotiate from a position of strength. There must be a real incentive for the Soviets to take these talks seriously. This requires that we rebuild our defenses.

“In the last decade, while we sought the moderation of Soviet power through a process of restraint and accommodation, the Soviets engaged in an unrelenting buildup of their military forces. The protection of our national security has required that we undertake a substantial program to enhance our military forces.

“We have not neglected to strengthen our traditional alliances in Europe and Asia, or to develop key relationships with our partners in the Middle East and other countries. Building a more peaceful world requires a sound strategy and the national resolve to back it up. When radical forces threaten our friends, when economic misfortune creates conditions of instability, when strategically vital parts of the world fall under the shadow of Soviet power, our response can make the difference between peaceful change or disorder and violence. That’s why we’ve laid such stress not only on our own defense but on our vital foreign assistance program. Your recent passage of the Foreign Assistance Act sent a signal to the world that America will not shrink from making the investments necessary for both peace and security. Our foreign policy must be rooted in realism, not naivete or self-delusion.

“A recognition of what the Soviet empire is about is the starting point. Winston Churchill, in negotiating with the Soviets, observed that they respect only strength and resolve in their dealings with other nations. That’s why we’ve moved to reconstruct our national defenses. We intend to keep the peace. We will also keep our freedom.

“We have made pledges of a new frankness in our public statements and world-wide broadcasts. In the face of a climate of falsehood and misinformation, we’ve promised the world a season of truth—the truth of our great civilized ideas: individual liberty, representative government, the rule of law under God. We’ve never needed walls or minefields or barbed wire to keep our people in. Nor do we declare martial law to keep our people from voting for the kind of government they want.” (Public Papers: Reagan, 1982, Book I, pages 77–78)

The full text of the President's State of the Union address is ibid., pages 72–79. In his personal diary entry for January 26, the President noted: "At noon a working lunch with the Cabinet. They now know what's in the St. of the U. address (I'm writing this before leaving for the Capitol). I wonder if I'll ever get used to addressing the joint sessions of Cong.? I've made a mil. speeches in every kind of place to every kind of audience. Somehow there's a thing about entering that chamber—goose bumps & a quiver. But it turned out fine—I was well received & I think the speech was a 4 base hit. We'll know more tomorrow." (Brinkley, ed., The Reagan Diaries, volume I, January 1981–October 1985, page 104) National Security Council staff memoranda concerning the preparation of the State of the Union address are in the Reagan Library, Executive Secretariat, NSC Subject File, State of the Union (1982) and in the Reagan Library, Executive Secretariat, European and Soviet Affairs Directorate, NSC Records, Subject File, Presidential Speeches/Interviews (1)–(6).

Secretary Block asked that the President recognize the importance of making a firm and clear statement to allay fears in the farm community and among foreign farm product buyers that the U.S. might not be a reliable trading partner. He asked Deputy Secretary Lyng to present the Department's views in greater detail.

Deputy Secretary Lyng presented charts² showing the alarming decline in the price of major commodities, and noted that expected bumper crops this year would cause continued low prices and depressed farm incomes. He said that in these circumstances rumors of a possible interruption of opportunities to market commodities internationally were taken very seriously by farmers. Forty percent of U.S. crop acreage is now devoted to export crops, and in FY81 food exports produced a $26 B contribution to the nation's balance of payments situation.

Mr. Lyng said that farmers traditionally feel that Washington doesn't understand farm problems, and they continually urge farm members of Congress to push Administrations into greater awareness. The House Agriculture Committee will hold a hearing on agricultural export policy on March 9.³ He said we needed a powerful statement on the foreign sales issue to allay fears of a new embargo, a statement he would like to have called "the Reagan Doctrine".⁴ The three points of such a doctrine would be:

² Not found.

³ See General Agricultural Export and Trade Situation: Hearing Before the Committee on Agriculture, House of Representatives, Ninety-Seventh Congress, Second Session, March 9, 1982, Serial No. 97-HHH (Washington: Government Printing Office, 1982).

⁴ Attached but not printed is the February 9 Department of Agriculture draft statement entitled, "The Reagan Doctrine: Establishing A Long Term National Policy of Agricultural Exports."

1) No restrictions would be imposed on the exportation of farm products because of rising domestic prices.

2) Farm exports will not be used as an instrument of foreign policy except in the most extreme situations and as a part of a total embargo. We will not interrupt exports to any nations except under conditions where a severe threat to this Nation's security is involved.

3) Foreign markets must be kept free of unreasonable trade barriers and unfair trade practices.

Secretary Block noted that this is largely a restatement of existing Presidential policy, but that packaging and announcing it properly would quite possibly make it national policy even after this Administration leaves office.⁵ He said this statement would be very good news for the farm community and would be extremely well received. American agriculture does not want to be a subsidized ward of the government; it can compete in world markets, given a fair opportunity, without trade barriers and without threat of interruption.

Secretary Haig stated that unilateral grain embargoes are self defeating. The Export Administration Act, however, affords the President sufficient authority, with sufficient ambiguities, to use an embargo flexibly in case of a severe foreign policy crisis.⁶ If a statement were made to afford some special exemption to agricultural products, the President would be saddling himself with a "mini-Clark Amendment" [prohibition of aid to Angolan rebels].⁷ The Secretary noted that his recent conversations with Soviet leaders showed that the Soviets are deeply worried about the Polish situation, and that a new grain embargo would be a "terrible problem" for them. The AFL CIO

⁵Reference is to a statement Reagan made at his February 18 news conference; a type-written excerpt from the news conference is attached but not printed. The President, in response to questions regarding his support for a "market-oriented agricultural policy" and the imposition of grain embargoes in Poland or in other countries, stated: "I have repeatedly said that the only way I would consider a grain embargo would be as a part of an across-the-board embargo, that we will not again make what I thought was a mistake earlier and penalize one sector of our industry, the famers, by just using that as an embargo item. So, we will not do that." He added that he was "very sympathetic to the agricultural industry, because I don't know of any industry that's been harder hit by the cost-price squeeze than the American farmer. And we're doing everything we can to stimulate foreign markets for them." (Public Papers: Reagan, 1982, Book I, p. 185)

⁶Reference is to the Export Administration Act of 1979 (P.L. 96-72; 93 Stat. 503), which Carter signed into law on September 29, 1979. The act permitted the President to control exports for various reasons, including for foreign policy.

⁷Reference is to the Clark amendment to the 1976 security assistance bill. Proposed by then-Senator Dick Clark (D-Iowa) on December 15, 1975, the amendment prohibited any assistance to military or paramilitary operations in Angola, except under specified conditions. The bill was passed with the Clark amendment on June 25, 1976, and Ford signed the International Security Assistance and Arms Export Control Act (P.L. 94-329; 90 Stat. 729) into law on June 30.

would be upset at exempting agriculture from any embargo; it would be seen as a special deal for farmers.

Ambassador Brock agreed with points 1 and 3 of the proposed statement, which he said was “basic Republicanism”. He noted that point 2 essentially restated the President’s campaign position. We do need to state that restraints on exports will never be used to undercut domestic prices, but point 1 should not be singled out. There is still a “hangover problem” from the Carter embargo.

Secretary Lewis suggested modifying point 2, but Secretary Haig argued that the President should not make a statement at all. The tensions over Poland are at a peak; such a statement would appear to be a softening of the President’s position. A broad free trade statement, reiterating the President’s remarks at Ottawa,⁸ would be appropriate, especially in view of trade barrier controversies with the European Community and Japan. All such issues should be raised at the forthcoming Economic Summit,⁹ but he questioned the wisdom and timing of such a statement.

Secretary Weinberger said such a statement would send an unfortunate signal to the Soviets just as the Siberian pipeline deal is being decided. It would hurt our Allies, but not the U.S., giving rise to Allied suspicions that we want them to sacrifice on the natural gas issue, while we are unwilling to face some sacrifice on farm exports. He noted that AFL CIO President Kirkland had told him that in case of a Polish invasion, he (Kirkland) could probably not restrain a work stoppage at shipping facilities—and probably wouldn’t want to; so that a “no embargo” policy might not even be a practical option. He said that attempting to define a rigid policy for the future involved making a definition of when to impose it; this would tend to tie the President’s hands like the Clark Amendment. The statement wouldn’t do much good and could do some real harm. The best policy would be to issue no statement at this time, especially if there is really nothing new in it.

Ambassador Brock reminded the Council that Congress, in the 1981 Farm Bill, had provided that in the event of a grain embargo the government would be obliged to offer crop loans at 100% of parity.¹⁰ This would mean on the order of a $30 B outlay for CCC. This is a very powerful deterrent to an embargo of farm products only. If national security is at stake, any embargo ought to be across the board in any case.

The President suggested dropping the adjective “farm” from point 2, so that it covered all exports. Mr. Meese noted that doing so would appear to go further than present policy, and that there was no good reason for doing so at this time.

Deputy Secretary McNamar said the timing was inauspicious for such a statement; that the Buckley mission was on its way to the EC,¹¹ and reiterating our unwillingness to suffer a grain embargo would undercut their negotiating position. He agreed with Secretary Weinberger’s points about inflexibility, and suggested that points 1 and 3, but not 2, be made in Presidential speeches as occasions arose.

Secretary Haig said that the prefatory statements in the draft would hinder our ability to influence the EC, and also would put the USSR on notice that we are reluctant to sacrifice. He said an agricultural export policy paper should be far broader, going into considerable detail about export promotion and trade barriers. He agreed with Secretary Block that there was actually nothing new in the proposed statement, and that a low-level acknowledgement of that fact via a press room statement would not be damaging.

Mr. Weidenbaum noted that merely deleting “farm” from point 2 would leave the prefatory remarks and the action points inconsistent; the former focuses on agricultural exports, while the latter, as amended, would be speaking of exports generally.

Secretary Lewis said the narrowness of the issue is not the problem; the problem is to help the Secretary of Agriculture calm an important sector of the economy. The President suggested that perhaps paragraph 3 of the preface and point 2 could be deleted, but Secretary Block pointed out that the subject of point 2 could not be ignored. Dr. Anderson said that it seemed to him that the farm community wanted an iron clad guarantee against an embargo, which was more than they really had a right to expect in view of possible national security considerations.

The President recollected that a farmer had spoken to him following the February 18 press conference statement, and had been very reassured on the embargo question. He thus saw the value of continued reassurance.¹²

Mr. Darman pointed out a dilemma: if point 2 is designed to satisfy farmers, it brings us up short in dealing with the Polish problem; if it is amended to refer to all exports, then it simply isn't true, in light of existing restrictions on high technology exports to the Eastern Bloc. The President suggested that perhaps point 2 could be concluded after "extreme situation". Secretary Haig reiterated his view that to say anything of value to the farm community, foreign policy flexibility would necessarily be compromised. Mr. McNamar observed that singling out one sector would lead to appeals for equal treatment from other sectors of the economy.

Secretary Block then suggested substituting the President's actual February 18 news conference statement for point 2. Secretary Haig said that there was a considerable difference between the President replying to a question at a news conference, and issuing a major policy statement on the issue.

Mr. Meese suggested that point 2 be rewritten to say: "The United States will be a reliable supplier of agricultural exports and will not treat agricultural products selectively or apart from other export items in regard to matters of our national security interests." Secretary Haig was not convinced. He inquired what we gained by making such a statement.

Mrs. Dole said that farm groups were very concerned about this issue, and that the substance of these policies should be incorporated in the President's remarks for farm editors, scheduled for late in March.¹³ Secretary Haig agreed. Mr. Lyng said that earlier action would be desirable; that Congress could well pass a joint resolution on the subject before then. Secretary Block supported the speech idea, saying it would get very big attention in farm areas and would be a big plus for the President. Mr. McNamar suggested that it should be held off until the Buckley mission gets home from Europe.

Deputy Secretary Wright said that farm policy should be addressed in the overall context of trade policy generally. Mr. Meese said this statement should be headed "agriculture policy", not "agricultural export policy". He suggested using the three points, as amended, for Congressional talking points and as the body of the farm editors speech. Secretary Haig agreed. It appeared that consensus was achieved on this recommendation.

¹³ The President offered remarks on agricultural policy to representatives of agricultural publications and organizations on March 22 at 3:18 p.m. in the Old Executive Office Building. Reagan outlined the "long-term policy on farm exports," asserting: "Now I announce this policy with a great sense of pride—the pride in the accomplishments of U.S. farm families. Adherence to this policy will bring them deserved credits and add to the prosperity of all Americans and enhance the cause of peace throughout the world." (Public Papers: Reagan, 1982, Book I, p. 349)

82. Editorial Note

President Ronald Reagan outlined his administration's proposed Caribbean Basin Initiative (CBI) in remarks made before the Permanent Council of the Organization of American States (OAS) on February 24, 1982, at 12:37 p.m. in the Hall of the Americas at the OAS Building. His remarks were broadcast live over the Voice of America (VOA) system. After an introduction by Ambassador Victor McIntyre of Trinidad and Tobago, the President stressed the commonalities of the people of the Western Hemisphere, highlighting shared principles and institutions. He continued: "Out of the crucible of our common past, the Americas have emerged as more equal and more understanding partners. Our hemisphere has an unlimited potential for economic development and human fulfillment. We have a combined population of more than 600 million people; our continents and our islands boast vast reservoirs of food and raw materials; and the markets of the Americas have already produced the highest standard of living among the advanced as well as the developing countries of the world. The example that we could offer to the world would not only discourage foes; it would project like a beacon of hope to all of the oppressed and impoverished nations of the world. We are the New World, a world of sovereign and independent states that today stand shoulder to shoulder with a common respect for one another and a greater tolerance of one another's shortcomings."

In sketching out his vision for the Caribbean Basin development program, the President underscored the strategic importance of the Caribbean and Central American nations, asserting that their current economic position "has provided a fresh opening to the enemies of freedom, national independence, and peaceful development." Noting that his administration had consulted with "other governments in the region" in devising the initiative, Reagan continued: "And we've labored long to develop an economic program that integrates trade, aid, and investment—a program that represents a long-term commitment to the countries of the Caribbean and Central America to make use of the magic of the market-place, the market of the Americas, to earn their own way toward self-sustaining growth."

Stating that the CBI represented an "integrated program that helps our neighbors help themselves," the President described the contours of the proposed program, which consisted of six components: securing free trade for Caribbean Basin exports to the United States; tax incentives for Caribbean investment; a $350 million supplemental fiscal year (FY) 1982 aid appropriation directed at the private sector; technical assistance and training; cooperation with Mexico, Canada, and Venezuela in development efforts; and additional measures to aid Puerto Rico and the U.S. Virgin Islands.

The President, after discussing the economic and social aspects related to development, then spoke of the “dangers” that “threatened” the hemisphere and the necessity for undertaking this effort: “The events of the last several years dramatize two different futures which are possible for the Caribbean area: either the establishment or restoration of moderate, constitutional governments with economic growth and improved living standards, or further expansion of political violence from the extreme left and the extreme right, resulting in the imposition of dictatorships and, inevitably, more economic decline and human suffering.”

Chronicling recent political developments in these nations, the President then discussed the U.S. responsibility in countering these threats: “I believe free and peaceful development of our hemisphere requires us to help governments confronted with aggression from outside their borders to defend themselves. For this reason, I will ask the Congress to provide increased security assistance to help friendly countries hold off those who would destroy their chances for economic and social progress and political democracy. Since 1947 the Rio Treaty has established reciprocal defense responsibilities linked to our common democratic ideals. Meeting these responsibilities is all the more important when an outside power supports terrorism and insurgency to destroy any possibility of freedom and democracy. Let our friends and our adversaries understand that we will do whatever is prudent and necessary to ensure the peace and security of the Caribbean area.”

The President concluded his remarks, stating: “We return to a common vision. Nearly a century ago a great citizen of the Caribbean and the Americas, José Martí, warned that, ‘Mankind is composed of two sorts of men, those who love and create and those who hate and destroy.’ Today more than ever the compassionate, creative peoples of the Americas have an opportunity to stand together, to overcome injustice, hatred, and oppression, and to build a better life for all the Americas.

“I have always believed that this hemisphere was a special place with a special destiny. I believe we are destined to be the beacon of hope for all mankind. With God’s help, we can make it so. We can create a peaceful, free, and prospering hemisphere based on our shared ideals and reaching from pole to pole of what we proudly call the New World.” (Public Papers: Reagan, 1982, Book I, pages 210–215)

In telegram 48847 to all diplomatic posts, February 24, 1906Z, the Department transmitted the text of the President’s remarks. 83. Editorial Note

On March 4, 1982, Secretary of State Alexander Haig testified before the House Committee on Appropriations Subcommittee on Foreign Operations and Related Agencies in support of the Ronald Reagan administration's foreign assistance budget request for fiscal year (FY) 1983. After Committee Chair Clarence D. Long (D-Maryland) welcomed him to the hearing, Haig indicated that he wished to deliver "a brief formal statement before submitting myself for your questions."

Haig first noted his previous appearance before the committee in 1981 and the "constructive relationship" that had developed between himself and the committee in the effort to "reinvigorate American leadership abroad." Recognizing that such progress should not stop, Haig stressed: "We must build on the progress that we have made. The competition we face is far too serious, and our own requirements too great to rest now. A first-rate American foreign policy simply cannot be run on second-rate resources."

After emphasizing the importance of foreign assistance as one of several "broad and flexible assets" in conducting U.S. foreign policy, Haig stated that he would explain President Ronald Reagan's request for increased security and economic aid. An absence of additional aid posed "risks to American national interests" he argued: "We would not be able to help reduce the economic misery in the Caribbean Basin that encourages domestic violence and external intervention.

"We would risk critical setbacks to our peace-keeping efforts in the Middle East and southern Africa.

"We might lose military facilities essential to the defense of Western interests in distant but vital regions of the world. Our access agreements to Kenya, Somalia, Oman and others help us to sustain a U.S. presence all along the vital oil routes to the Middle East.

"We would court the danger of further deterioration in the military capabilities and economies of key allies, such as Turkey.

"We might encourage the subversive efforts by Soviet and Soviet proxy forces. Our assistance is vitally important to countries friendly to the West, such as Pakistan, Sudan, Yemen, Morocco, Tunisia, Somalia and Oman, all of which are under growing pressure from the Soviets or client states of the Soviet Union.

"We risk damage to important markets and commercial ties. Today, more than one-quarter of our agricultural and manufactured exports goes to the developing world.

"Finally, we might weaken valuable multilateral financial institutions which have contributed to economic growth and must continue their vital role in economic development.

"The President's program of foreign assistance is not only a safeguard against all these dangers, but an integral element of the President's foreign policy. It is absolutely necessary if our strategies are to succeed in achieving their objectives."

Haig then discussed the ways in which foreign assistance helped the Reagan administration achieve its foreign policy objectives in specific geographical areas. He concluded his prepared remarks by reasserting the importance of increased aid in a time of austerity: "To assure the most effective use of our scarce resources, the President has realigned foreign assistance allocations with careful attention to priorities. The promotion of a truly lasting economic growth remains one of our key objectives. Our program recognizes that assistance alone will not guarantee economic development. Growth also requires proper economic incentives, national commitment, and a reliance on the creativity and resourcefulness of the individual.

"The program also responds to the pressing needs of key strategic nations for increased economic support and concessional military sales. Such nations must receive help in order to bolster their defense against outside subversion and to prevent economic crises at the same time.

"Our new focus on essential strategic and development objectives should not obscure our pride in the continuing American commitment to traditional humanitarian objectives. We remain a major source of assistance to refugees in Africa, Pakistan, Southeast Asia and the Middle East.

"We direct the bulk of our development and food aid to the world's poorest nations. These countries, with limited access to private capital markets, depend on concessional assistance to support their development efforts. To meet these needs, President Reagan committed the United States at Cancun to maintaining assistance levels to these nations.

"Mr. Chairman, I recognize that approval of foreign assistance at this time of austerity will be very difficult. But we shall pay a greater price later if we do not act now. America's most essential interests are under attack. The President firmly believes that the resources he has requested are crucial to defense of these interests and to the promotion of a more peaceful and secure world. Our nation's security tomorrow requires that we make an investment in foreign assistance today." 84. Memorandum From Secretary of State Haig to President Reagan¹

Washington, March 8, 1982

SUBJECT

Strategy for Building Democracy in Communist and Non-Communist Countries

Developments in Poland and El Salvador teach us three important lessons in politics: 1) there are growing pressures for political change in communist and authoritarian countries alike; 2) if we want democratic forces to win, they need practical training and financial assistance to become as effective as the communists in the struggle to take and maintain power; and 3) the United States is organized to give economic and military assistance, but we have no institutions devoted to political training and funding.

I propose that we establish an institute and program to support democratic change. This could be one of your Administration's most important and enduring contributions to global freedom and security. Let us take the Soviets on in a field where we have the best inherent strengths, but today lack the tools which they have so massively and professionally developed over many years.

1. The Problem

The Soviets spend large sums on training and financing political forces for change in Europe and the Third World. Going back to Lenin and even earlier, communists have placed the highest of priorities on establishing political parties, underground communications, and motivation.

Even some of our European allies understand the importance of practical political support. For example, Western Europeans sent money and advisors to Portuguese democratic parties to prevent a communist takeover. The United States is simply out of the picture. Neither our parties nor the CIA have significant programs. And the AFL-CIO's efforts are restricted to unions.

Furthermore, the Europeans are just as derelict as we in terms of efforts designed to help democratic forces in communist countries. There isn't even much study being done of how communist regimes can be changed—even though it is clear that the potential exists (witness Solidarity, Yugoslavia, thousands fleeing Cuba, etc.).

Obviously there are constraints on what we can do towards both communist and non-communist countries in the immediate future. We would need to begin on a pragmatic and careful basis. A sudden, full-fledged effort would be counter-productive—destabilizing non-democratic friends in the Third World, driving the Soviets into perhaps dangerous counter-actions, and alarming our European allies with visions of an all-out effort to destabilize Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union itself.

But in sum, and taking into account the need for this gradual approach, there are four reasons to develop a program to support the growth of democratic forces:

1) Ultimately a truly stable, cooperative and open international system requires societies based on freedom of choice and legitimacy rather than force and oppression;

2) In non-communist countries, we need to help moderate democratic forces as the best long-term protection against communism;

3) We can help to keep the Soviets preoccupied with problems inside their existing empire (rather than expanding further) by giving practical assistance to democratic and nationalistic forces and thus going on our own political offensive. The use of this political tool is no less effective than military and economic leverage, and is much less costly and risky.

4) Launching a program to support democracy now can help provide a new focus for our idealism, give the Successor Generation here and in Europe something other than nuclear disarmament as a goal, gain bipartisan support, and give your Administration a positive, freedom-oriented face.

2. The Solution

Specifically, we propose that the United States establish an "Institute for Democracy." The Institute's objective would be three-fold:

1) to analyze and develop ways to help transform communist and other forms of dictatorship into democratic societies;

2) to train people in the practical mechanisms required for such peaceful transformation—overt/underground/exile political parties, labor unions, press, communications, etc.;

3) to help finance these efforts in the countries concerned.

The Institute should be non-governmental to be effective and to fend off charges of interference from other countries. The Europeans and the Soviets use such “private” institutions for political operations without serious problems. At the same time, the Institute would require Congressional as well as private funding to make the kind of major, sustained and professional effort required.

3. Next Steps

—The first step clearly is for you to decide whether you agree that this proposal should be implemented.

—Then an interagency group should draw up a gameplan for obtaining Congressional and public support, possibly including a speech by you or me on the theme “democracy not Marxism-Leninism is the future.”

We have uncovered substantial support for this idea from informal soundings around town. Right-wing critics of the Administration like Wattenberg and Podhoretz² are enthusiastic. Max Kampelman is prepared to contribute his time to help get it going. The AFL–CIO is positive. Liberals will strongly endorse the Third World dimension.

We should use the climate generated by Poland to set up a permanent program to tackle the larger, longer-term task of building democracy in communist and non-communist states. This could be one of your Administration’s most important and enduring contributions to global freedom and security. The moment for it may not come again for many years.

Recommendation

That you endorse the establishment of an Institute for Democracy.³

SUBJECT

Secretary Haig's Recommendation Concerning the Establishment of an Institute for Democracy

Secretary Haig has written a memo to the President (Tab A) in which he urges that the President "... endorse the establishment of an Institute for Democracy."² The purpose of this Institute, which would be private, would be to train and help finance democratic leaders from the Soviet Bloc and the LDC's.

His suggestion has serious problems, such as:

1. How would the Institute get hold of "democratic leaders" from the Soviet Bloc for training, and how would they be reintroduced into their countries?

2. The Institute, if sponsored by the government, or "endorsed" by it, would be seen by all as a government initiative.

3. Friendly authoritarian governments among the LDC's would see it as an attempt to destabilize them.

4. Finally, and most important, dictatorship, whether authoritarian or totalitarian, can be imposed, democracy can't. The Soviets can be sure that if a Communist coup is successful, a Communist government will result. No one can know what will result from a "democratic" coup, as several centuries of history testify.

Incidentally, under Clif White's leadership, the Republican Party is beginning to get more involved in international cooperation. This process should be encouraged.

Carnes Lord and William Stearman concur with my recommendation that the President disapprove the suggestion in Secretary Haig's memo.

Al Myer, Dick Childress, Chris Shoemaker, Dick Pipes and Jim Rentschler believe that further exploration of the concept is necessary on an interagency basis to address the numerous aspects of this idea prior to the establishment of a specific program. Myer, Childress and Shoemaker have provided an alternative memo to Secretary Haig (Tab II) suggesting that the proposal be examined in greater detail.³

Recommendation:

That you sign the memorandum to the President at Tab I recommending that he disapprove the suggestion in Secretary Haig's memo.⁴

Alternatively, that you sign the memorandum to Secretary Haig at Tab II suggesting that the proposal be examined in greater detail before the establishment of a specific organization.

86. Editorial Note

On March 10, 1982, members of Congress submitted bipartisan resolutions calling for the United States and the Soviet Union to undertake a nuclear weapons freeze followed by arms reductions. In the Senate, Senator Edward Kennedy (D–Massachusetts) introduced Senate Joint Resolution 163 on behalf of himself and 26 others. For the text of Senate Joint Resolution 163, see Nuclear Arms Reduction Proposals: Hearings Before the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, Ninety-Seventh Congress, Second Session, on S.J. Res 163, 171, 177, 191; S. Res. 242, 323, 343, 370, 391; S. Ex. Res. 5, 6; and S. Con. Res. 81, April 29, 30, May 11, 12, and 13, 1982, pages 4–5. See also Judith Miller, "139 in Congress Urge Nuclear Arms Freeze by U.S. and Moscow," New York Times, pages A1 and A12, and Margot Hornblower, "Bipartisan Resolutions Urge U.S.-Soviet Nuclear Weapons Freeze," Washington Post, page A3; both March 11, 1982.

During hearings held on March 10 by the Senate Committee on Appropriations Subcommittee on Foreign Assistance and Related Programs to consider foreign assistance appropriations for fiscal year (FY) 1983, Subcommittee Chair Robert Kasten (R–Wisconsin) asked Secretary of State Alexander Haig if the freeze proposals introduced that day would advance U.S. security interests. Haig responded: "Well, I had a telephone call from Senator Kennedy last night informing me that this proposal would be put forward suggesting that he regretted that it hadn't been discussed with us before then. I am aware of this freeze proposal, however, because it has a number of supporters, well-meaning supporters, and I would just make the following general comments.

"This freeze proposal is not only bad defense and security policy, it is bad arms control policy, as well. It is clear that the Soviet Union over the past 15 years has outspent the United States in the development of their strategic nuclear capability by substantial margins, each year and every year for the past 15. That has enabled them to develop a level of existing and future strategic superiority in especially the instantaneous hard target kill capability and large ballistic missile imbalances have developed.

"I would consider it to be very destabilizing were we today to freeze the contemporary balance into an imbalance. That will not contribute to progress in either arms control or meet the vital security interests of the American people.

"Now, I want to emphasize that President Reagan's arms control policy is not to freeze at unacceptable levels that we have already reached, but rather to achieve substantial reductions in levels of nuclear armament and to do so in a way that we can verify such reductions have taken place.

"Unfortunately, this freeze proposal runs directly against both of those principles, and I am particularly concerned at this time that such a proposal would come forward in the midst of the INF discussions which are underway in Geneva in which we seek to eliminate in the land-based sector the threat entirely by the so-called zero action.

"Now the freeze as applied in Western Europe would be to freeze in place a minimum of 3 to 1 Soviet superiority and something more analytically in the neighborhood of 6 to 1 superiority of Soviet systems. The instability and the political disarray of such a proposal by the U.S. side could be devastating not only in terms of the future direction of Western European policy vis-a-vis the Soviet Union, but more importantly to undercut the very initiative that we have just lost in these discussions.

"So while one cannot question the well-meaning motivations of this resolution and this proposal, one must analyze the practical consequences of it, and for that reason, I am very concerned about it." (Foreign Assistance and Related Programs Appropriations for Fiscal Year 1983: Hearings Before a Subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations, United States Senate, Ninety-Seventh Congress, Second Session, Part 1, pages 64-65)

During a briefing held at the Department of State on March 11, Department spokesperson Dean Fischer read to news correspondents a prepared statement on behalf of Director of the Bureau of Politico-Military Affairs Richard Burt regarding the resolutions: "I would like to make a brief statement with respect to the nuclear freeze resolution which was introduced in the Senate yesterday.

“The President and his entire Administration share the concern felt throughout the world over the danger that nuclear weapons pose for mankind. That is why, in his speech of November 18, the President proposed a far-reaching arms control program for seeking equitable and verifiable agreements, which will not just freeze current nuclear and conventional forces but actually significantly reduce them.

“In Geneva the United States is now negotiating with the Soviet Union on the basis of the President’s bold proposal of November 18, which calls for the elimination of the Soviet nuclear systems most threatening Europe in exchange for cancellation of scheduled NATO deployments of comparable intermediate-range land-based nuclear missiles.

“While we understand the spirit that motivates the freeze efforts, the Administration cannot support the freeze itself. A number of compelling facts argue against a freeze.

“—It would freeze the United States into a position of military disadvantage and dangerous vulnerability. Soviet defense instruments have far outpaced ours over the last decade. While we exercised substantial restraint, the Soviets’ across-the-board modernization efforts have produced new weapons, including new generations of intercontinental ballistic missiles directly threatening our nuclear deterrent. In Europe, Soviet deployments of new intermediate-range missiles have given the Soviet Union an overwhelming advantage over the West in this category of weapons.

“—We want verifiable agreements that go beyond freezes to produce real reductions. The freeze proposal, which is neither verifiable nor reduces weapons, is not only bad defense but, as Secretary Haig said yesterday, is bad arms control as well.

“—The President needs the strategic modernization program if we are to have a credible chance to negotiate a good strategic arms reduction agreement with the Soviets. The freeze would, of course, kill the modernization program and with it our chances for achieving the reductions that we all seek.

“—We have embarked on very important negotiations on intermediate-range nuclear forces with the Soviet Union in Geneva—negotiations in which the United States is seeking far more than a freeze. Our goal in Geneva is the total elimination of land-based intermediate-range missiles. Thus the United States and the NATO alliance must have the flexibility to continue with the two-track approach that NATO agreed to in 1979. The freeze proposal would concede to the Soviet Union its present advantage in intermediate-range nuclear missiles and eliminate any Soviet incentive to reach a fair and balanced agreement that would reduce nuclear weapons in Europe.” (Department of State Bulletin, May 1982, page 42)

Al Haig's Recommendation Concerning Endorsement of the Establishment of an Institute for Democracy

Issue

Should you endorse the establishment of an "Institute for Democracy"?

Facts

Al Haig has written you (Tab A)² suggesting that you endorse the establishment of an "Institute for Democracy" to train and partially fund democratic leaders from the Soviet Bloc and the LDC's.

Discussion

It is difficult to know how Soviet Bloc "democratic" leaders would be brought over for training or how they would be re-introduced to their countries. As for the LDC's, such an effort would be seen by friendly but authoritarian regimes as an attempt to destabilize them. Choice of participants would be difficult, if not impossible; political hopefuls always claim to be "democratic" until they take power. Finally, dictatorship can be imposed; democracy cannot—it must develop organically or not at all.

Recommendation

OK No

_____ _____ That you disapprove Al's suggestion to establish an "Institute for Democracy."³

³ The President did not check either option under Recommendation. However, in a March 19 handwritten note to Wheeler, Poindexter stated that Clark had shown the President Haig's memorandum, adding: "The President has decided he wants State to study the matter in more detail. Please have prepared a memo from the Judge to Haig, John." (Reagan Library, European and Soviet Affairs Directorate, NSC Records, Subject File, Democracy (Democratization of Communist Countries) (1 of 5)) Under an undated covering memorandum, Blair sent Clark for his signature a draft memorandum to Haig. In the covering memorandum, Blair wrote: "Admiral Poindexter's note says that the President wishes State to study further the proposal on establishing an Institute for Democracy. Norm Bailey is not enthusiastic about the whole idea; I am, so I have taken over staffing responsibility." (Ibid.) For the President's response to the proposal, see Document 89.

SUBJECT

Linking the Economic and NATO Summits²

Issue for Decision

We recommend you review informally with senior White House officials the linkage between the Summits and ideas for maximizing our leverage at both.

Essential Factors

The two forthcoming Summit meetings are linked in terms of timing, preparation, and substance. Success at Versailles will carry over to Bonn; conversely, the way we prepare the NATO Summit issues will affect the outcome of Versailles.

The issues at Versailles will probably be even more important and more difficult than those at Bonn, but we need significant results from both meetings. The fundamental inseparability of economic and military strength for an effective Western defense should come through in both.

Organizationally, Versailles will concentrate on the economic issues, with emphasis on the ways and means of re-establishing vigorous economic growth in the West. We will want to concentrate political discussion at Bonn, and therefore will avoid a formal political agenda at Versailles. In particular, we do not want unproductive and, even worse, acrimonious exchanges on regional issues (e.g., Central America, the Middle East) on which our views differ sharply from those of our Allies. Insofar as informal and unstructured political discussions do take place at Versailles, they will be an opportunity to set the political context for East-West economic decisions and to prepare the ground for the NATO meeting.

At Versailles, we will seek to:

- Reconfirm the wisdom of a policy to curb inflation and stimulate private sector activity as the best means of revitalizing Western economies;
- Place greater emphasis on policy coordination in pursuit of these goals;
- Obtain a political commitment to resolving problems which face the multilateral trading system and to a productive GATT ministerial this fall;³ and
- Obtain agreement on the objectives of, and a mechanism for monitoring and limiting official credits to the Soviet Union.

The Europeans and Japanese hope to come away from Versailles with assurances that American economic policy will be tempered by due regard for the international effects of monetary and fiscal moves. They will be looking, before as well as during the Summit, for concrete evidence of American sensitivity to their concerns about interest rates and on exchange variability. Japan will be particularly concerned that it not be singled out for criticism of its trade policy.

Aside from reaffirmation of the health and vitality of the Alliance (as exemplified by Spanish entry),⁴ our major objective at Bonn will be agreement on a special Charter on Improved Conventional Defense. Among other things, this will include:

- Commitment to achieving a significantly improved conventional defense posture within five years through improving forward defense by increasing readiness of reserve forces, enhancing reinforcement capabilities, maximizing the effectiveness of existing forces, and applying new technologies.
- Shift in emphasis from measures of defense input to defense output while reaffirming the commitment to the minimum of 3% annual real increases.

⁴ Documentation on Spanish entry in NATO is scheduled for publication in Foreign Relations, 1981–1988, vol. VII, Western Europe, 1981–1984.

- Resolving to devote more resources to defense as the economic situation improves.
- Strengthening the existing force planning process.

Before and at Bonn, our Allies will be seeking evidence of renewed American commitment to arms control, most specifically as it relates to the opening of START and to the U.S. approach to nuclear arms negotiations. We, in turn, will be emphasizing that greater Western solidarity towards the USSR, including on economic questions, would help us on the full range of East-West relations, including moving ahead on geopolitical issues and arms control.

If we cannot produce the assurances which the Allies seek on U.S. economic policy, we may have great difficulty in achieving our East-West economic objectives at Versailles and our defense objectives at Bonn. The Allies might take the line that the economic outlook prevents them from restricting trade with the East or undertaking a commitment to devote more resources to defense in the years ahead.

These factors suggest that we emphasize the following in our pre-Summit preparations:

- Exploiting any economic policy decisions between now and June, especially on reducing the prospective budget deficit, to convince the Europeans and Japanese that we are responding to their economic needs, and to seek some quid-pro-quo either in the Versailles or Bonn context.

- Pushing hard for agreement on a mechanism to monitor and restrict the volume and terms of official credits and credit guarantees to the Soviet Union.

- Staying with our firm approach to the Soviets on geopolitics and arms control, and continuing to seek Allied support.

- PM believes that we should impress upon appropriate European leaders that Allied cohesion on East-West economic issues would facilitate movement by us on arms control, particularly START. Specifically, agreement by the Europeans at Versailles on a mechanism to monitor credits to the East would allow us to give greater prominence to arms control at the NATO Summit. We might wish to be even more precise with Schmidt and suggest that we would be willing to announce before the April 18–23 SPD Party Conference the opening of START if he were to promise to work for Summit agreement on a credit monitoring mechanism. PM recognizes that given the pace at which domestic pressures are building for START, we may not be able to secure much from the Europeans through such a linkage, but believes the effort nevertheless worth making. EUR, EB, and S/P do not believe that we should link the question of credits for the Soviet Union to progress on arms control, because that could make the commencement of START hostage to resolution of other difficult issues and would not be credible to the Europeans. However, in pressing very hard for agreement on credits, we should point out that the U.S. regards limiting Western credits to the USSR as an urgent element on the Allied agenda, one which is essential in establishing an acceptable East-West balance.

To convince our Summit partners of our willingness to coordinate economic policies, an end to the current stalemate with the Congress, leading to significant reductions in the projected deficits for 1983–86, is fundamental. If an “oil import fee” were part of the budget package, it would have particular appeal to Europe and could be used to extract some concessions on energy security. However, this issue is and should remain primarily a domestic one. In fact, introduction of foreign policy concerns prematurely could thwart achievement of domestic political objectives. Nevertheless, we should ensure that senior officials at the White House understand the potential benefits of any eventual budget compromise for the President’s success at the two Summits.

Recommendation

That you make the points in the attachment to senior White House officials.⁵

⁵ Attached but not printed is a set of undated talking points. Haig did not approve or disapprove the recommendation. Under a March 30 memorandum, Haig sent the President a paper, which he described as “a framework for approaching both Summits in a coordinated manner.” He also wrote: “Your European trip will be a major foreign policy event, and can set the framework for Allied economic and security cooperation for years to come. The international institutions established in the immediate post-war period need modernizing. Your participation in the June Summits can energize this process.” (Reagan Library, National Security Affairs, Office of Assistant to the President Files, Chron File; NLR-812-81-16-6-7) The memorandum is scheduled for publication in Foreign Relations, 1981–1988, vol. SUBJECT

Strategy for Building Democracy in Communist and Non-Communist Countries

The President has reviewed the proposal in your memorandum of March 8 for an "Institute for Democracy." The proposal has many attractive features but before endorsing the proposal, he would like more specific information on several aspects:

—How the institute could avoid being seen as an agency of the U.S. government, while acting in a complementary way to government policies.

—How the institute would treat non-democratic countries which are friendly to the United States.

—The outlines of the organization of the institute: physical facilities required, composition of faculty, choice of students, decision-making authority to disburse funds to groups in other countries.

FOR THE PRESIDENT:

Washington, April 3, 1982

SUBJECT

Private Proposal for a "No First Use" Nuclear Weapons Doctrine

"The time has come for careful study of the ways and means of moving to a new (NATO) alliance policy and doctrine: that nuclear weapons will not be used unless an aggressor should use them first." This proposal is argued in an article co-authored by former Secretary of Defense Bob McNamara, McGeorge Bundy, George Kennan and Gerry Smith to be published in Foreign Affairs next Wednesday.² Given the simplicity of the concept, the standing of the authors in the national security community and the existence of an anti-nuclear movement which is in a position to promote the concept extremely well, the article provides a timely catalyst for sustaining criticism of Administration policies already well advanced under the nuclear freeze banner. It will also be extremely disruptive to allied cohesion, thus it is extremely important that we develop a prompt comprehensive strategy for dealing with this issue.

Background

Throughout the post-war period the Soviet Union has enjoyed conventional military superiority over NATO forces in Europe. The unwillingness of the West to field an adequate conventional deterrent force derives in part from economic considerations, but far more importantly from European perceptions that the most effective guarantor of their security—the most effective deterrent to conflict—reposed in the strategic nuclear power of the United States (ICBMs, SLBMs and bombers). The doctrinal and physical linkage to our strategic forces lay in the deployment of substantial U.S. conventional forces in Europe and in the presence of tactical nuclear weapons deployed in Europe since the mid-1950's.

The credibility of this doctrine began to be questioned in the mid-1970's as United States strategic nuclear superiority eroded. For as long as the United States possessed clear strategic nuclear superiority, the question as to whether we would use it in response to an attack on Western Europe was relatively moot because the Soviets were unlikely to test it. Once that superiority was lost, however, penetrating questions began to be raised among our allies. These were attenuated by an explicit elaboration of the problem by former Secretary Kissinger in a speech given in Europe in September 1979.³

The simplistic answer to this question of credibility is that we and our allies should devote the necessary effort to establish effective deterrence at every conceivable level of attack. That is, that we should expand the current level of our conventional forces in Europe, of our theater nuclear forces and of our strategic arsenal to match the corresponding forces of the Soviet Union. As a practical matter, however, that is asking the impossible; again, for economic but more importantly for political reasons. In economic terms, if we have not been able during the past 30 years to develop an effective conventional deterrent, how much more unrealistic is it to expect to do so today in a time of far greater economic austerity. More importantly, however, to even suggest the idea would be to shatter the credibility of the generation-old U.S. pledge of its strategic nuclear arsenal as a deterrent to a Soviet attack on Western Europe. In the trade this is referred to as “decoupling” U.S. strategic nuclear forces from the defense of Europe.

Discussion

Setting aside for a moment the intellectual hypocrisy of such a proposal by men who were the authors of our current first-use doctrine, we must consider the near-term effects of it. In Europe any appearance of the Administration’s support for a “no first use” doctrine would have a catastrophic effect upon allied cohesion generally and the political stability of several governments in particular. For example, we have already had word from FRG Foreign Minister Genscher that U.S.

³ Kissinger took part in a 3-day conference on NATO’s future, organized by the Georgetown University’s Center for Strategic and International Studies (CSIS), in Brussels, September 1–3, 1979. In remarks made on September 1, Kissinger said: “Don’t you Europeans keep asking us to multiply assurances we cannot possibly mean and that if we do mean, we should not want to execute, and which if we execute, would destroy our civilization.” (Paul Lewis, “U.S. Pledge to NATO To Use Nuclear Arms Criticized by Kissinger,” New York Times, September 2, 1979, p. 7) Kissinger, however, clarified his earlier statement at a September 3 news conference. According to the New York Times, “Kissinger said that he intended on Saturday [September 1] to convey his belief that America’s promise to defend its European allies is losing credibility as the Soviet arms buildup continues. However, he said today that the situation will not become critical ‘for another three or four years.’” (“Kissinger Tones Down Warning to NATO on U.S. Nuclear Pledges,” New York Times, September 4, 1979, p. A10) See also Joseph Fitchett, “Kissinger Says Europe Should Rely Less on U.S.” Washington Post, September 3, 1979, p. A26.

support for a “no first use” doctrine would have an extremely divisive effect upon the political debate in West Germany.

With respect to the substance of the issue, your original decisions to restore the strength of both our strategic and conventional forces puts us well along toward assuring not only effective deterrence but of restoring allied confidence as well. Coming at a time in which the Soviet Union is under severe internal economic pressure, the prospects for strategic stability in the coming years are reasonably good. We and our allies share that view. This basic consensus among political leaders of the alliance, however, is susceptible to erosion if your European counterparts are forced to yield over time to a ground swell of public sentiment that could develop on a foundation of simplistic notions, such as the “freeze” and a “no first use” doctrine.

We believe that our strategy for dealing with this issue must be preemptive, comprehensive and sustained. In order to effectively pre-empt the McNamara/Bundy article, Al Haig will deliver a major Address on Tuesday designed to build public understanding of the historical effectiveness and intellectual defensibility of our current doctrine.⁴ Al’s speech must be buttressed by prompt reinforcement through White House statements, congressional statements and an aggressive program of public appearances by knowledgeable and effective spokesmen. Simultaneously, we must tend anxieties in Europe through prompt consultations with our allies. Finally, however, we must understand that this movement will not go away, and as a consequence, that the credibility of your policies must continue to be nurtured in thoughtful, persuasive public statements. We have separately submitted a strategy for speeches which we propose that you give over the course of the next three months.⁵

I will continue to work with Al, Cap and others to flesh out the strategy sketched above and will provide a fuller proposal next week.

Peace and Deterrence

It is a melancholy fact of the modern age that man has conceived a means capable of his own destruction. For 37 years mankind has had to live with the terrible burden of nuclear weapons. From the dawn of the nuclear age, these weapons have been the source of grave concern to our peoples and the focus of continuous public debate. Every successive president of the United States has shared these concerns. Every Administration has had to engage itself in this debate.

It is right that each succeeding generation should question anew the manner in which its leaders exercise such awesome responsibilities. It is right that each new Administration should have to confront the awful dilemmas posed by the possession of nuclear weapons. It is right that our nuclear strategy should be exposed to continuous examination.

Strategy of Nuclear Deterrence

In debating these issues, we should not allow the complexity of the problems and the gravity of the stakes to blind us to the common ground upon which we all stand. No one has ever advocated nuclear war. No responsible voice has ever sought to minimize its horrors.

On the contrary, from the earliest days of the postwar era, America's leaders have recognized that the only nuclear strategy consistent with our values and our survival—our physical existence and what makes life worth living—is the strategy of deterrence. The massive destructive power of these weapons precludes their serving any lesser purpose. The catastrophic consequences of another world war—with or without nuclear weapons—make deterrence of conflict our highest objective and our only rational military strategy for the modern age.

Thus, since the close of World War II, American and Western strategy has assigned a single function to nuclear weapons: the prevention of war and the preservation of peace. At the heart of this deterrence strategy is the requirement that the risk of engaging in war must be made to outweigh any possible benefits of aggression. The cost of aggression must not be confined to the victims of aggression.

This strategy of deterrence has won the consistent approval of Western peoples. It has enjoyed the bipartisan support of the American Congress. It has secured the unanimous endorsement of every successive allied government.

Deterrence has been supported because deterrence works. Nuclear deterrence and collective defense have preserved peace in Europe, the crucible of two global wars in this century. Clearly, neither improvement in the nature of man nor strengthening of the international order has made war less frequent or less brutal. Millions have died since 1945 in over 130 international and civil wars. Yet nuclear deterrence has prevented a conflict between the two superpowers, a conflict which even without nuclear weapons would be the most destructive in mankind's history.

Requirements for Western Strategy

The simple possession of nuclear weapons does not guarantee deterrence. Throughout history societies have risked their total destruction if the prize of victory was sufficiently great or the consequences of submission sufficiently grave. War and, in particular nuclear war, can be deterred, but only if we are able to deny an aggressor military advantage from his action and thus insure his awareness that he cannot prevail in any conflict with us. Deterrence, in short, requires the maintenance of a secure military balance, one which cannot be overturned through surprise attack or sudden technological breakthrough. The quality and credibility of deterrence must be measured against these criteria. Successful administrations have understood this fact and stressed the importance of the overall balance. This Administration can do no less.

The strategy of deterrence, in its essentials, has endured. But the requirements for maintaining a secure capability to deter in all circumstances have evolved. In the early days of unquestioned American nuclear superiority the task of posing an unacceptable risk to an aggressor was not difficult. The threat of massive retaliation was fully credible as long as the Soviet Union could not respond in kind. As the Soviet Union's nuclear arsenal grew, however, this threat began to lose credibility.

To sustain the credibility of Western deterrence, the concept of flexible response was elaborated and formally adopted by the United States and its NATO partners in 1967.² Henceforth, it was agreed that NATO would meet aggression initially at whatever level it was launched, while preserving the flexibility to escalate the conflict, if necessary, to secure the cessation of aggression and the withdrawal of the aggressor.

² Reference is to the communiqué issued on December 14, 1967, following the NAC Ministerial session in Brussels, December 12–14. The "flexible response" concept, as stated in the communiqué, included a range of "conventional and nuclear" responses "to all levels of aggression and threats of aggression." For the text of the final communiqué and annex, see Department of State Bulletin, January 8, 1968, pp. 49–52.

The purpose of this strategy is not just to conduct conflict successfully if it is forced upon us but, more importantly, to prevent the outbreak of conflict in the first place.

Flexible response is not premised upon the view that nuclear war can be controlled. Every successive allied and American government has been convinced that nuclear war, once initiated, could escape such control. They have, therefore, agreed upon a strategy which retains the deterrent effect of a possible nuclear response, without making such a step in any sense automatic.

The alliance based its implementation of flexible response upon a spectrum of forces, each of which plays an indispensable role in assuring the credibility of a Western strategy of deterrence. At one end of the spectrum are America's strategic forces, our heavy bombers, intercontinental missiles, and ballistic missile submarines. Since NATO's inception, these forces have been the ultimate guarantee of Western security, a role which they will retain in the future.

At the other end of the spectrum are the alliance's conventional forces, including U.S. forces in Europe. These forces must be strong enough to defeat all but the most massive and persistent conventional aggression. They must be resistant and durable enough to give political leaders time to measure the gravity of the threat, to confront the inherently daunting prospects of nuclear escalation, and to seek through diplomacy the cessation of conflict and restoration of any lost Western territory. The vital role which conventional forces play in deterrence is too often neglected, particularly by those most vocal in their concern over reliance upon nuclear weapons. A strengthened conventional posture both strengthens the deterrent effect of nuclear forces and reduces the prospect of their ever being used.

Linking together strategic and conventional forces are theater nuclear forces, that is, NATO's nuclear systems based in Europe. These systems are concrete evidence of the nature of the American commitment. They are a concrete manifestation of NATO's willingness to resort to nuclear weapons if necessary to preserve the freedom and independence of its members. Further, the presence of nuclear weapons in Europe insures that the Soviet Union will never believe that it can divide the United States from its allies or wage a limited war with limited risks against any NATO member.

The strategy of flexible response and the forces that sustain its credibility reflect more than simply the prevailing military balance. Western strategy also reflects the political and geographical reality of an alliance of 15 independent nations, the most powerful of which is separated from all but one by 4,000 miles of ocean.

Deterrence is consequently more than a military strategy. It is the essential political bargain which binds together the Western coalition.

Twice in this century, America has been unable to remain aloof from European conflict but unable to intervene in time to prevent the devastation of Western Europe. In a nuclear age neither we nor our allies can afford to see this pattern repeated a third time. We have, therefore, chosen a strategy which engages American power in the defense of Europe at the outset and gives substance to the principle that the security of the alliance is indivisible.

The Task Ahead

During the past decade the Soviet Union has mounted a sustained buildup across the range of its nuclear forces designed to undermine the credibility of the Western strategy. Soviet modernization efforts have far outstripped those of the West. The development and deployment of Soviet intercontinental ballistic missiles now pose a serious and increasing threat to a large part of our land-based ICBM [intercontinental ballistic missile] force. A new generation of Soviet intermediate-range missiles is targeted upon our European allies.

In the last 10 years, the Soviets introduced an unprecedented array of new strategic and intermediate-range systems into their arsenals, including the SS-17, SS-18, and SS-19 ICBMs, the Backfire bomber, the Typhoon submarine and several new types of submarine-launched missiles, and the SS-20 intermediate-range missile. In contrast, during this same period, the United States exercised restraint, introducing only the Trident missile and submarine and the slower air-breathing cruise missile.

In order to deal with the resulting imbalances, President Reagan has adopted a defense posture and recommended programs to the U.S. Congress designed to maintain deterrence, rectify the imbalances, and thereby support the Western strategy I have just outlined. His bold strategic modernization program, announced last October, is designed to insure the maintenance of a secure and reliable capability to deny any adversary advantage from any form of aggression, even a surprise attack.³

The President's decision, in his first weeks in office, to go ahead with the production and deployment of the Pershing II and ground-launched cruise missiles, in accordance with NATO's decision of December 1979, represents an effort to reinforce the linkage between our strategic forces in the United States and NATO's conventional and nuclear forces in Europe. A response to the massive buildup of Soviet SS-20s targeted on Western Europe, this NATO decision was taken to insure that the Soviet Union will never launch aggression in the belief that its own territory can remain immune from attack or that European security can ever be decoupled from that of the United States.

The improvements we are making in our conventional forces—in their readiness, mobility, training, and equipment—are designed to insure the kind of tough and resilient conventional capability required by the strategy of flexible response. It is important to recognize the interrelationship of these three types of forces. The requirements in each category are dependent upon the scale of the others. Their functions are similarly linked. The Soviet Union understands this. That is why they have consistently proposed a pledge against the first use of nuclear weapons, an idea which has achieved some resonance here in the West.

NATO has consistently rejected such Soviet proposals, which are tantamount to making Europe safe for conventional aggression. If the West were to allow Moscow the freedom to choose the level of conflict which most suited it and to leave entirely to Soviet discretion the nature and timing of any escalation, we would be forced to maintain conventional forces at least at the level of those of the Soviet Union and its Warsaw Pact allies.

Those in the West who advocate the adoption of a “no first use” policy⁴ seldom go on to propose that the United States reintroduce the draft, triple the size of its armed forces, and put its economy on a wartime footing. Yet in the absence of such steps, a pledge of “no first use” effectively leaves the West nothing with which to counterbalance the Soviet conventional advantages and geopolitical position in Europe.

Neither do Western proponents of a “no first use” policy acknowledge the consequences for the alliance of an American decision not to pose and accept the risk of nuclear war in the defense of Europe. A “no first use” policy would be the end of flexible response and thus of the very credibility of the Western strategic deterrence. In adopting such a stance, the United States would be limiting its commitment to Europe. But the alliance cannot function as a limited liability corporation. It can only survive as a partnership to which all are equally and fully committed—shared benefits, shared burdens, shared risks.

Another concept which has recently attracted interest is that of a freeze on nuclear weapons.⁵ While being sensitive to the concerns underlying this proposal, we have had to underscore the flaws in such an approach. A freeze at current levels would perpetuate an unstable and unequal military balance. It would reward a decade of unilateral Soviet buildup and penalize the United States for a decade of unilateral restraint. As President Reagan stressed last week, such a freeze would remove all Soviet incentive to engage in meaningful arms control designed to cut armaments and reduce the risk of war.⁶

Much of the argumentation for a nuclear freeze revolves around the question of how much is enough. Each side possesses thousands of deliverable nuclear weapons. Does it really make any difference who is ahead? The question itself is misleading, as it assumes that deterrence is simply a matter of numbers of weapons or numbers of casualties which could be inflicted. It is not.

- Let us remember, first and foremost, that we are trying to deter the Soviet Union, not ourselves. The dynamic nature of the Soviet nuclear buildup demonstrates that the Soviet leaders do not believe in the concept of “sufficiency.” They are not likely to be deterred by a strategy or a force based upon it.

- Let us also recall that nuclear deterrence must work not just in times of peace and moments of calm. Deterrence faces its true test at the time of maximum tension, even in the midst of actual conflict. In such extreme circumstances, when the stakes on the table may already be immense, when Soviet leaders may feel the very existence of their regime is threatened, who can say whether or not they would run massive risks if they believed that in the end the Soviet state would prevail?

- Deterrence thus does not rest on a static comparison of the number or size of nuclear weapons. Rather, deterrence depends upon our capability, even after suffering a massive nuclear blow, to prevent an aggressor from securing a military advantage and prevailing in a conflict. Only if we maintain such a capability can we deter such a blow. Deterrence, in consequence, rests upon a military balance measured not in warhead numbers but in a complex interaction of capabilities and vulnerabilities.

⁶ At his March 31 news conference Reagan responded to a question posed by UPI reporter Helen Thomas inquiring why the United States did not “seek negotiations for a freeze now,” stating, in part: “Helen, I know that there are people that have tried to figure this out. The truth of the matter is that on balance, the Soviet Union does have a definite margin of superiority, enough so that there is risk and there is what I have called, as you all know, several times, ‘a window of vulnerability.’ And I think that a freeze would not only be disadvantageous—in fact, even dangerous to us with them in that position—but I believe that it would also militate against any negotiations for reduction. There would be no incentive for them, then, to meet with us and reduce.” (Public Papers: Reagan, 1982, Book I, p. 399)

The Military Balance, Crisis Management, and the Conduct of American Diplomacy

The state of the military balance and its impact upon the deterrent value of American forces cast a shadow over every significant geopolitical decision. It affects on a day-to-day basis the conduct of American diplomacy. It influences the management of international crises and the terms upon which they are resolved.

The search for national interest and national security is a principal preoccupation of the leaders of every nation on the globe. Their decisions and their foreign policies are profoundly affected by their perception of the military balance between the United States and the Soviet Union and the consequent capacity of either to help provide for their security or to threaten that security.

More important still, perceptions of the military balance also affect the psychological attitude of both American and Soviet leaders, as they respond to events around the globe. For the foreseeable future the relationship between the United States and the Soviet Union will be one in which our differences outnumber our points of convergence. Our objective must be to restrain this competition, to keep it below the level of force, while protecting our interests and those of our allies. Our ability to secure these objectives will be crucially influenced by the state of the strategic balance. Every judgment we make and every judgment the Soviet leadership makes will be shaded by it.

Thus the Soviet leadership, in calculating the risks of subversion or aggression, of acquiring new clients or propping up faltering proxies, must carefully evaluate the possibilities and prospects for an effective American response. Soviet calculations must encompass not only American capabilities to influence regional developments but American willingness to face the prospect of U.S.-Soviet confrontation and consequent escalation. American leaders, for their part, must go through comparable calculations in reacting to regional conflicts, responding to Soviet adventurism, and seeking to resolve international crises in a manner consistent with U.S. interests.

Put simply, our own vulnerability to nuclear blackmail, as well as the susceptibility of our friends to political intimidation, depends upon our ability and willingness to cope credibly with any Soviet threat. A strong and credible strategic posture enhances stability by reducing for the Soviets the temptations toward adventurism at the same time that it strengthens our hand in responding to Soviet political-military threats.

Arms Control and Nuclear Deterrence

In no area of diplomacy does the military balance have greater effect than in arms control. Arms control can reinforce deterrence and stabilize a military balance at lower levels of risk and effort. Arms control cannot, however, either provide or restore a balance we are unwilling to maintain through our defense efforts.

Just as the only justifiable nuclear strategy is one of deterrence, so the overriding objective for arms control is reducing the risk of war. The essential purpose to arms control is not to save money, although it may do so. Its purpose is not to generate good feelings or improve international relationships, although it may have that effect as well. Arms control's central purpose must be to reinforce the military balance, upon which deterrence depends, at reduced levels of weapons and risk.

On November 18, President Reagan laid out the framework for a comprehensive program of arms control designed to serve these objectives. He committed the United States to seek major reductions in nuclear and conventional forces, leading to equal agreed limits on both sides. Last week he reviewed the steps we have taken.

- In Geneva we have put forth detailed proposals designed to limit intermediate-range nuclear forces and to eliminate entirely the missiles of greatest concern to each side. This proposal has won the strong and unified support of our allies.⁷

- In Vienna we are negotiating, alongside our allies, on reductions in conventional force levels in Europe.⁸ These negotiations have gone on without real progress for over 8 years. Because we are now facing diplomatic atrophy, we must urgently consider how to revitalize East-West discussions of conventional force reductions and stimulate progress in these talks.

- Our highest priority, in the past several months, has been completing preparations for negotiations with the Soviet Union on strategic arms. Here too we will be proposing major reductions to verifiable, equal agreed levels. Here too we will be presenting detailed proposals when negotiations open.

The prospects for progress in each of these areas of arms control depend upon support of the President's defense programs. This imperative has been caricatured as a policy of building up arms in order to reduce them. This is simply not true. As President Reagan's proposals for intermediate-range missiles make clear, we hope that we never

⁷ The INF negotiations opened in Geneva on November 30, 1981, and reconvened on January 12, 1982. On February 2, U.S. negotiators submitted to the Soviet Union a draft treaty. In a February 4 statement, the President said: "Such a treaty would be a major contribution to security, stability, and peace." (Public Papers: Reagan, 1982, Book I, p. 112) The Department transmitted the draft treaty text to all North Atlantic Treaty Organization capitals in telegram 41427, February 17. (Department of State, Central Foreign Policy File, Electronic Telegrams, D820084-0511) have to deploy those systems. But we must demonstrate a willingness to maintain the balance through force deployments if we are to have any prospect of reducing and stabilizing it through arms control.

Negotiations in the early 1970s on a treaty limiting antiballistic missile (ABM) systems provide an historic example.⁹ At the time, the Soviets had already built a system of ballistic missile defenses around Moscow. The United States had deployed no such system. Arms control offered the only means of closing off an otherwise attractive and expensive new avenue for arms competition. Yet it was not until the American Administration sought and secured congressional support for an American ABM program that the Soviets began to negotiate seriously. The result was the 1972 treaty limiting antiballistic missile systems, which remains in force today.

This same pattern was repeated more recently with intermediate-range missiles. For years the Soviets had sought limits on U.S. nuclear forces in Europe but refused to consider any limits upon their nuclear forces targeted upon Western Europe. Only after NATO took its decision of December 1979 to deploy U.S. Pershing II and ground-launched cruise missiles did the Soviet Union agree to put its SS-20 missiles on the negotiating table.

In the area of strategic arms, as well, there is little prospect the Soviet Union will ever agree to equal limits at lower levels unless first persuaded that the United States is otherwise determined to maintain equality at higher levels. It is, for instance, unrealistic to believe that the Soviet Union will agree to reduce the most threatening element of its force structure, its heavy, multiwar-headed intercontinental missiles unless it is persuaded that otherwise the United States will respond by deploying comparable systems itself.

For many opposed to reliance on nuclear weapons—even for defense or deterrence—the issue is a moral one. For those who first elaborated the strategy of deterrence, and for those who seek to maintain its effect, this issue is also preeminently moral. A familiar argument is that, in a nuclear age, we must choose between our values and our existence. If nuclear weapons offer the only deterrent to nuclear blackmail, some would argue we should submit rather than pose the risk of nuclear conflict. This choice, however, is a false one. By maintaining the military balance and sustaining deterrence, we protect the essential values of Western civilization—democratic government, personal liberty, and religious freedom—and preserve the peace. In failing to maintain deterrence, we would risk our freedoms, while actually increasing the likelihood of also suffering nuclear devastation.

As human beings and free men and women, we must reject this false alternative and avoid the extremes of nuclear catastrophe and nuclear blackmail. In the nuclear age, the only choice consistent with survival and civilization is deterrence.

An eminent theologian once described our age as one in which “the highest possibilities are inextricably intermingled with the most dire perils”. The scientific and technological advances so vital to our civilization also make possible its destruction. This reality cannot be wished away.

Americans have always been conscious of the dilemmas posed by the nuclear weapon. From the moment that science unleashed the atom, our instinct and policy have been to control it. Those who direct America’s defense policies today share completely the desire of people everywhere to end the nuclear arms race and to begin to achieve substantial reductions in nuclear armament.

Confronted by the dire perils of such weapons, America has responded in a manner that best preserves both security and peace, that protects our society and our values, and that offers hope without illusion. The strategy of deterrence has kept the peace for over 30 years. It has provided the basis for arms control efforts. And it offers the best chance to control and to reduce the dangers that we face.

Deterrence is not automatic. It cannot be had on the cheap. Our ability to sustain it depends upon our ability to maintain the military balance now being threatened by the Soviet buildup. If we are to reinforce deterrence through arms control and arms reduction, we must convince the Soviets that their efforts to undermine the deterrent effect of our forces cannot and will not succeed.

The control and reduction of nuclear weapons, based on deterrence, is the only effective intellectual, political, and moral response to nuclear weapons. The stakes are too great and the consequences of error too catastrophic to exchange deterrence for a leap into the unknown. The incentives for real arms control exist, and we have both the means and the duty to apply them.

Let us be clear about our objectives in the nuclear era. We seek to reduce the risk of war and to establish a stable military balance at lower levels of risk and effort. By doing so today, we may be able to build a sense of mutual confidence and cooperation, offering the basis for even more ambitious steps tomorrow. But above all, we shall be pursuing the “highest possibility” for peace.

92. Memorandum of Conversation¹

Washington, April 13, 1982, 2:30–3:15 p.m.

SUBJECT

Kissinger Group Meeting with the President

PARTICIPANTS

The President
Edwin Meese, III, Counselor to the President
David R. Gergen, Assistant to the President
Mort Allin, Assistant Press Secretary / Foreign Affairs
William P. Clark, Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs
Henry A. Kissinger
Lawrence Brainard, Bankers Trust Company
Willard Butcher, Chase Manhattan Bank
Edmund W. Littlefield, Utah International Inc.
Elvis L. Mason, InterFirst Corporation
David Rockefeller
William D. Rogers, Arnold & Porter
George Shultz, Bechtel Group, Inc.
Walter Wriston, First National City Bank
Marc Leland, Under Secretary for International Affairs, Department of the Treasury
Norman A. Bailey, NSC Staff

The meeting began with Dr. Kissinger presenting a paper entitled “Talking Points” to the President.²

Dr. Kissinger proceeded to outline the findings of his group. The main point made was that even if there is no crisis, the economic relationship has tilted in favor of the Soviet Union. In strictly economic terms, they gain. So we must counterbalance in other areas. What are our priorities? We need to organize the economic strength of the West—leading to negotiations later. Occasional unilateral sanctions don’t work well.

There are three options: (1) economic warfare, (2) continue present practices—everyone on his own, (3) period of disciplined economic pressure leading to eventual negotiations and enhanced cooperation (Kissinger group favors this option).

The meeting took place in the Roosevelt Room at the White House. No drafting information appears on the memorandum; presumably drafted by Bailey. In his personal diary entry for April 13, the President wrote: “Henry Kissinger brought group of businessmen & bankers to help with our East-West relations. A good meeting.” (Brinkley, ed., The Reagan Diaries, vol. I, January 1981–October 1985, p. 123)

In the last four years most credit has been official. If the market is allowed to operate, it will handle matters. Only a Presidential initiative will work—a summit or other—to use this period of Soviet weakness to get our efforts coordinated.

We need to coordinate our objectives. What do we mean by disciplined restraints? We need to develop a coherent understanding of the purpose of sanctions.

What do we have to offer down the road in the way of economic cooperation? We have not addressed the question of differentiation. We have not addressed the question of what to do if the allies do not accept a coordinated approach.

Shultz: The Soviets need us a lot more than we need them. Nevertheless, they use these tools much more effectively than we do. Ours is technological, theirs is not. We sell our stuff on concessional terms. (He makes the point again of private vs. public lending to Poland.) If government-supported credits could be curtailed, there would be very little flow. We must have a long-term approach—a sustained effort. Curtailing of official credit.

Wriston: It's a question of what to get the Europeans to stop doing. We need to turn the market back to market forces.

Rockefeller: (He reported on Trilateral Commission meeting on East-West economic relations.)³ We must have cooperation. It must be at a high level. Credit area is the greatest area of potential cooperation. The pipeline is a foregone conclusion.⁴ If we go along, we might get something from them.

The President: The allies are unwilling to go along with sanctions. (He uses the pipelayer example.) Have we failed to bring out to them that the concept is temporary to persuade them to come back to the "real world"? No one is out to attack them. We've been more successful in the credit line.

Kissinger: A reduction in arms would make the Soviets more creditworthy.

The President: They could turn their economy around.

Shultz: Their system causes the failure of agriculture.

The President: Here the situation is the opposite—high productivity, low price. We will all look at these papers with great interest.

93. Memorandum From Dennis Blair of the National Security Council Staff to the President's Assistant for National Security Affairs (Clark)¹

Washington, April 19, 1982

SUBJECT

Strategy for Building Democracy in Communist and Non-Communist Countries

Al Haig earlier sent you a memorandum (Tab II)² proposing the idea of a bipartisan, government/private institute to work openly to build democratic institutions in countries that do not now have them. You sent the idea to the President, who asked for more study.³

State's response is at Tab A.⁴ The concept now is for the President in his June 6 London speech to announce a bipartisan study to make specific recommendations on structure and organization of the institute. The basic idea is to give the United States an additional foreign policy instrument for dealing with authoritarian regimes. For right-wing dictatorships we currently have no choice besides propping them up until they fall, and then watching helplessly while left-wing replacements take over; for communist and other left-wing governments we are long on rhetoric and provide limited covert assistance to opponents. We need a way to operate openly in support of moderates who are trying to build the structure of democracy—political parties, trade unions, media, etc.

The NSC staff is split in its recommendations on this idea: Rentschler, Shoemaker, Meyer and Childress and I are in favor. Bailey thinks the concept deeply flawed (his views at Tab III).⁵ Stearman and

³ Not attached. See footnote 3, Document 87.

⁴ Not attached. The April 13 memorandum from Bremer to Clark is the Department's response to Clark's April 2 memorandum to Haig (see Document 89). The memorandum is in the Reagan Library, European and Soviet Affairs Directorate, NSC Records, Subject File, Democracy (Democratization of Communist Countries) (1 of 5).

⁵ Not attached. In an April 14 memorandum to Blair, Bailey characterized the Department memorandum (see footnote 2, above) as "entirely unsatisfactory" as it ignored democracy building in communist countries, included "suggestions as to maintaining the myth of independence from the government," that were "ludicrous" and "dangerous," and failed to answer the question as to how "labor leaders, journalists and others from friendly dictatorships" would be trained without damaging our relationships with those dictatorships." He concluded, "I reiterate my belief that the idea should be classified with perpetual motion and anti-gravity devices." (Reagan Library, European and Soviet Affairs Directorate, NSC Records, Subject File, Democracy (Democratization of Communist Countries) (1 of 5))

Lord think the concept is appealing, but impossible to implement: the body will be “tainted” as an arm of the U.S. government, yet the government will not have complete control.

Other officials are enthusiastic about the idea—in addition to Haig, Bill Casey likes it as does Bill Brock and Chuck Manatt of the Democratic National Committee. Irving Brown, International Director of the AFL/CIO, is enthusiastic. I think the concept is worth a try—especially as a study.⁶ It would provide a good initiative for the President’s London speech, which is devoted to the future of democracy, and will spark further ideas on how to build democracies.

Recommendation:

94. Paper Prepared by Steven Sestanovich of the Policy Planning Staff¹

Washington, April 21, 1982

REPORT CARD DISCUSSION

I. Assessments of Reagan Administration foreign policy performance must reflect weak U.S. hand: stagnant economy, reviving Vietnam syndrome and priority of domestic issues, disorderly alliance relations, momentum of local/regional events, etc. Conclusion: Significant imbalance between U.S. interests and power to defend them.

¹ Source: Department of State, Executive Secretariat, S/P Files, Memoranda and Correspondence from the Director of the Policy Planning Staff to the Secretary and Other Seventh Floor Principals: Lot 89D149, S/P Chrons PW 4/21–30/82. No classification marking. Drafted by Sestanovich. A notation in an unknown hand, presumably Kaplan’s, in the top right-hand corner of the memorandum reads: “to: P. Wolfowitz, fm: Steve Sestanovich, 4/21/82, w/copies to JR [James Rowe], NT [Nathan Tarcov].”

II. Difficulties evident in five major tasks of our foreign policy.

1. Management of strategic relationships

Examples: Euro-allies, China

2. Consolidating new relationships in unstable areas

Examples: Pakistan, Saudi Arabia

3. Resolving most dangerous regional conflicts

Examples: Namibia, El Salvador

4. Exploiting exposed Soviet positions

Examples: Poland, Afghanistan

5. Managing public attitudes

Example: arms control

III. Operational principles. To deal with above problems, U.S. policy must balance conflicting imperatives: short vs. long term, limiting damage vs. incurring costs and risks.

For example, four simple principles:

A. Stay out of trouble in the short term: shore up major weak positions, avoid creating new problems.

B. Begin long-term efforts to strengthen and extend U.S. positions and capabilities.

C. Seize opportunities as they open up, respond to emergencies.

D. Attach high priority to secure fall-back positions.

NB: A and D emphasize damage-limitation; B and C incur costs.

IV. Of above principles, A and C appear to dominate present foreign policy. Even though the one principle limits damage and the other accepts costs so as to make gains, this is a potentially disastrous combination, for they do not make up for each other's inadequacies.

—A is a sustainable policy only if supported by B. Unless the long-term position of the US is improving by itself, policies are needed that accept the cost of achieving improvement. Without this, C may only expose weakness.

—C is a safe policy only if supported by D. Falling back on A, without attention to secure fall-back positions, may only make A less successful.

V. How have these guidelines (of sections III and IV) been applied to tasks of section II?

1. Managing strategic relationships

—Euro-allies: High-priority damage-limitation very successful, but less success at turning corner to B. As a result, Euro-cooperation on C remains tense, uncertain.

—China: No success with A; new problems have arisen, making B more remote and D more important. Fall-back positions, however, have been understood by us chiefly as involving avoidance of blame, not as strengthening U.S. ability to sustain more distant relationship.

2. New relationships in unstable areas

—Saudi Arabia: Despite initial hopes, expectation that relationship could move from A to B not realized, despite costs to U.S. of AWACS affair: a legitimate decision not to press² harder, but to date no fall-back position/replacement for S.A. a centerpiece of U.S. regional security policy.

—Pakistan: Weak position successfully bolstered, with careful balance of A and B, and readiness to accept costs (both in muscling GOP and countering domestic attitudes). Long-term relationship/commitment undefined, vulnerable to nuclear issue. No exploration of Indian possibilities.

3. Regional conflicts

—El Salvador: C without D—opportunity seized, without fall-back positions, perhaps from over-confidence. Damage done to management of public attitudes by showing Viet syndrome strong.

—Namibia: To date, successful pursuit of B at expense of A: acceptance of short-term costs (identification with South Africa) for improved longer-term position. Close attention to fall-back position, but only so as to avoid blame for failure. (Stronger fall-back, enabling us to affect events, may not be possible.)

4. Exploiting exposed Soviet positions

—Poland: Martial law seen as major opportunity, but soon became apparent can't follow principle C if alliance management policy is governed by A. Thus, early retreat to long-term B: try to reform East-West economic relations at the margin; sensible, but failure to see very far down the road at outset of crisis. Damage done by steps that couldn't be sustained.

² An unknown hand inserted "to" between "not" and "press."

—Afghanistan: An opportunity to be seized, but not fully exploited, perhaps from fear of creating new problems. If so, a major sacrifice of B for A. Low level assistance does not reflect high stakes: major Soviet defeat could turn back broader Soviet offensive. Longer-term perspective (B) would mean increased aid, but this requires in turn attention to fall-back (D).

5. Public attitudes

—Arms control: Plausible case for A alone, while allowing military spending to strengthen B and exploiting public relations potential (C). But nuclear debate shows fall-back position may be weak. Priority to propaganda use may be at expense of real agreement, at least during this Administration.

VI. Summary and Conclusion

—Performance shortfalls seem to involve pattern of overemphasis on A and C.

—Implications for S/P: attention needed for how to turn the corner from A to B, how to improve fall-back positions.

SUBJECT

Observations on a US-Soviet Summit

Brezhnev wants a real summit in Europe (instead of a handshake in New York) in order to promote the current Soviet peace campaign and slow down US and NATO defense improvements. For this and additional reasons described below, I do not believe that a summit this year would serve U.S. interests; however, if the President wants to avoid taking a negative position on a summit, he might follow President Eisenhower's example and put a price tag on it. (C)

Beginning in 1953, Churchill pushed for a summit with the new post-Stalin Soviet leaders.² Eisenhower indicated that he would agree to a summit if the Soviets would: sign a German Peace Treaty or an Austrian State Treaty or contribute to real arms control progress. The Soviets agreed to the Austrian Treaty, which was signed in May 1955,³ and a summit was held in Geneva that July.⁴ The resulting "Spirit of Geneva" detente atmosphere was slowly eroding NATO's strength and cohesion when this detente was ended by the 1956 Hungarian Revolution.⁵ (It should be noted that the foreign ministers conference, which followed up on the Geneva summit, produced no real results, but this fact was overshadowed by the prevailing post-summit euphoria.) (C)

The record of US-Soviet summit meetings would indicate that they should be avoided altogether. In terms of U.S. interests, these summits have ranged from being unnecessary to disastrous—with the sole exception of Camp David 1959⁶ which postponed Soviet action on Berlin until U-2 coverage revealed there was no "missile gap," which fact strengthened our negotiating position. In addition to providing the Soviets an ideal propaganda platform and promoting their "super power" image, summits present other intrinsic problems. (U)

At best, summits permit only a superficial exchange of views on complex and potentially dangerous issues. There is little actual time for discussion, and this is halved by the interpreters. US-Soviet summits engage two men with vastly different backgrounds, mentalities and objectives. (I am only being half facetious when I say that any American President should have had extensive dealings with Mafiosi in order to really be prepared for encounters with Soviet leaders.) Thus, summits can hardly result in any real meeting of minds and can easily lead to serious and even dangerous misunderstandings and miscalculations. For example, I have long been convinced that the 1961 Kennedy-Khrushchev

Vienna summit (in which I was involved)⁷ was responsible for both the Berlin Wall and the 1962 Cuban missile crisis. (C)

Since U.S. recognition of the USSR in 1933, all previous U.S. Presidents have met with Soviet leaders (bilaterally beginning with Camp David). It is, therefore, unrealistic to expect President Reagan to avoid summitry altogether. He is bound to come under increasing pressure to have a summit. He can, however, follow Eisenhower's example and demand of the Soviets some price of admission, some earnest of their good intentions, such as: acceptance of our "zero option" proposal⁸ withdrawal from Afghanistan or ending martial law in Poland. (C)

Richard Pipes concurs in views expressed above.

Policy Offensive on Arms Control and the Anti-Nuclear Movement

The movement to educate Americans on the effect of nuclear weapons is gaining momentum, and this week enters a crucial phase.² Ground Zero activities are pictured as educational by its national organizers, who claim to want to arouse the citizenry rather than propose specific solutions, such as a nuclear freeze. But under the Ground Zero umbrella are a variety of policy proposals that would be detrimental to the United States. The next phase for the movement could be toward promotion of policy solutions, as its leaders try to keep up momentum. In any event, Ground Zero educational activities leave the movement open for exploitation by others of all stripes.

² Clark's reference is to Ground Zero Week, April 18–25. Molander, a former NSC staff member during the Ford and Carter administrations and current Executive Director of a non-partisan nuclear war education project known as "Ground Zero," and others worked to organize the event, which consisted of a variety of seminars and other activities taking place in cities and on university campuses throughout the United States. (Robert G. Kaiser, "Movement Against Nuclear Arms Is Mushrooming," Washington Post, April 11, 1982, pp. A1, A4, and Judith Miller, "New Look at Stopping Nuclear War," New York Times, April 17, 1982, p. 8)

Our effort should be directed toward convincing Americans whose anxieties are heightened by this movement that our policy solutions best meet their desire that the United States do something to lessen the prospect of a nuclear holocaust. The time for us to do something is now, and I agree with Dave Gergen that the communications effort must be pulled together by the NSC and White House.

We have begun. I will personally chair an interagency meeting, probably this week, with a specific agenda to deal with the issues.³ I have no illusions about solving our problem by asking the bureaucracy to produce fact sheets on a lot of esoteric issues. That's just the kind of activity that could give everyone a feeling of accomplishment, while actually not moving the ball an inch. My purpose is to sensitize all departments to our concern about the direction of public and international opinion on arms control, and to emphasize our desire to take the lead in the policy solution phase of the movement's activities. I want to involve all departments in a coordinated strategy, bringing their talents to bear on specific aspects of the problem.

In no way do I wish to foster a "we/they" syndrome, wherein we become antagonists with Roger Molander of Ground Zero, or Billy Graham,⁴ or 40 Catholic Bishops,⁵ or the Mayor of Pella, Iowa.⁶ The broad public is being awakened to the problem specialists in and out of government have dealt with for years: they are scared to death at the prospect of nuclear war.⁷ We should welcome the public's concern about this issue, as it parallels our own. But we must convince the public that our policies are best for dealing with their newfound concerns: that unilateral disarmament by the United States would only endanger us more; that progress can be made only when the Soviets (where is their anti-nuclear movement, we should ask) respond to our fears about the growth of their conventional and nuclear armaments. We should go beyond a static restatement of our policy to generate real enthusiasm for new initiatives as we unfold them, especially our proposals for START. Clearly, as Dave Gergen says, we should emphasize the President's role as a peacemaker, but we must not let the Russians off the hook. We must also focus on concrete policy and new initiatives; otherwise, our "peace offensive" will be met with cynicism, both at home and abroad.

⁶ In an April 16 article, Wall Street Journal reporter John J. Fialka described the planning for Ground Zero week in Pella, noting that "after a year of organizing effort" Ground Zero was "about to hit the streets in an attempt to reach the nonactivists. More specifically, on Sunday [April 18] it will hit the town square here when a small group of people, including Mayor C.B. 'Babe' Caldwell, will erect a large sign near Tulip Tower, an imposing red, white and blue structure that is normally used for Tulip Time, Pella's springtime festival of flowers and Dutch folk activity. The sign will say: 'If This Were Ground Zero, a One Megaton Nuclear Explosion Would Totally Destroy Virtually Everything Within Two Miles of This Spot—Instantly.'" (John H. Fialka, "Ground Zero: Town of Pella, Iowa, Talks of Little Other Than Nuclear Attack: Group Favoring Arms Freeze Stresses Atomic Horrors, But Some Ears Are Deaf: Refugees From Des Moines?" Wall Street Journal, April 16, 1982, pp. 1, 22)

A strategy for the next six months could include these activities:

a) Immediate efforts to enhance communication of the President's philosophy on arms control. The radio talk Saturday was a beautiful step in the right direction—perfectly timed to present the President's views at the beginning of Ground Zero week, rather than in reaction to it.⁸ We should hammer his theme in the immediate future, as in Gene Rostow's speech at the National Press Club (Monday, April 19),⁹ in network television opportunities involving Administration spokesmen and friends, and in Senate testimony on the Jackson/Warner Amendment later this month.¹⁰ This will mean passing the word to our own people and briefing outside organizations and individuals on a priority basis, one of the things I will stress at our initial interagency

⁷ An unknown hand placed a checkmark in the left-hand margin next to this sentence.

⁸ The President delivered his weekly radio address from Camp David on April 17 at 12:06 p.m. In it, he stated: "Today, I know there are a great many people who are pointing to the unimaginable horror of nuclear war. I welcome that concern. Those who've governed America throughout the nuclear age and we who govern it today have had to recognize that a nuclear war cannot be won and must never be fought. So, to those who protest against nuclear war, I can only say, 'I'm with you.' Like my predecessors, it is now my responsibility to do my utmost to prevent such a war. No one feels more than I the need for peace." (Public Papers: Reagan, 1982, Book I, p. 487) meeting.¹¹ The themes must be kept basic. Any cabinet member or political official may expect to receive questions in public on this issue; while we do not want every appointee to become our spokesman, each senior official should know how to handle the issue when it comes up.¹² More important, we urgently need a small, but readily available, stable of articulate people who can address the issue and guide the public to support our policy solutions. We should identify these people, and promptly formalize a system for providing our spokesmen on request—or better yet, on our own initiative—for public speeches, television appearances, editorial board conferences, media interviews, and group meetings.

b) Communications with the activists. The fact that the activists have our attention should be kept secret. We want to demonstrate that we, too, are activists—seeking resolution to the same concerns. As we organize to deal with the problem more coherently, we should make it known without fanfare that we are doing so, rather than have the media leap on the inevitable leak to portray us as secretive and defensive. Also, I see no reason to rule out high-level meetings soon with people like the Physicians for Social Responsibility group, Molander, Billy Graham, or Senator Jackson—meetings designed to show the public that we are paying attention to the national message of concern, and that we have the best program to deal with those concerns.¹³ These meetings could hint at new initiatives and solicit views and recommendations. Even if the meetings do not reassure or convert the participants, they should at least help reassure the concerned public as to our good faith and reasonableness. (I am not suggesting meetings with those who are intent on political exploitation of the issue and would gain more from the exposure than would we. Questions of who to meet with, where, when, who should represent us, etc., need careful examination, but with dispatch.)

c) Address the arms control issue in the President's foreign policy speech in May and again on television prior to the European trip. The President should restate his policy as a major, but not central, part of his overall foreign policy speech, foreshadowing a new initiative in connection with START. Then, in line with Dave Gergen's suggestion, he should go on prime time to present his arms control proposals and propose a date for START.¹⁴ This appearance should come as soon as feasible after the foreign policy speech, and should be designed to capture the initiative by its boldness, to give the President genuine national (and perhaps bipartisan) foreign policy support as he goes to Europe. The television talk and our associated efforts could be the key to gaining public support from June to November. The talk should be accompanied by an all-out communications and policy coordination effort.¹⁵ The logic in doing this before Europe and before his UN speech seems overwhelming to me; but so is the task of agreeing on policy proposals, coordinating with allies overseas and here, and undertaking the communications effort in the relatively short time left.¹⁶ Needless to say, the reaction of the Soviets, other countries, and our public to the President's presentation will be factors in deciding how to proceed during the European trip and at the UN. The point is that we must go on the offensive and stay on the offensive, rather than waiting and reacting—a situation likely to give the Soviets and anti-government forces in this country the upper hand.

Getting the job done:

This strategy calls for a special organizational approach. Ideally, one individual—a Special Advisor reporting directly to the President and working closely with the National Security Advisor—should manage this issue as a sole responsibility. He or she should establish a senior-level steering committee of principal members of the White House staff and Deputies in other key departments. This Special Advisor should keep policy issues moving, orchestrate our actions, take over and push the communications effort I have initiated, act as principal articulator of policy in public appearances, and develop and lead a team of spokesmen. There are drawbacks to this approach: we'd need an individual with the abilities and stature of a Henry Kissinger to make it work best; staffing and obtaining cooperation from all departments could be problems. However, the management advantages are obvious: there would be full time top-level attention to the problem; Presidential involvement and control would be insured. Public affairs benefits would also accrue—we would have a competent and authoritative spokesman and team leader; we'd be giving evidence of the serious attention the Administration is placing on the issue. Another obvious advantage: the Special Advisor assignment would not last forever. It would stop, at latest, with START.

The alternative to a Special Advisor is for the President to designate someone with functional responsibility—the Vice President, Secretary of State, National Security Advisor, or Director of ACDA—to take the lead and devote the major part of his time and effort to the project. That route presents many opportunities for failure.

In conclusion, what I have outlined is a proposed grand strategy to deal with what may be the most important national security opportunity and challenge of this Administration. With some hard work, it can be done. Success in the next six months is well within our grasp. There is no need for panic, only for planning and action. We should be fully in agreement on this strategy before proceeding. Could we talk about it briefly at everyone's earliest convenience.

97. Information Memorandum From the Director of the Policy Planning Staff (Wolfowitz) to the Under Secretary of State for Political Affairs (Eagleburger)¹

Washington, April 22, 1982

SUBJECT

US Policy Toward the Third World

A Conceptual Overview of the Third World: Diversity and Complexity

Conventional stereotypes about the Third World fail to recognize the fundamental diversity and complexity that characterize the nations usually so described. It is misleading to conceive of the Third World as a single entity for it includes not only the poorest nations of the world in which starvation and disease are still the most pressing problems, but also nations like Singapore that have worked miracles of economic growth through free market policies, sparsely populated oil-producing countries that have acquired enormous wealth through the OPEC cartel, and major potential economic powers like Brazil.

Confidential. Drafted by Tarcov, Keyes, Feldstein, Kaplan, and Thornton on April 23; cleared by Benedick, Pratt, Levitsky, Michalopoulos, Graner, George Brown, McMullen, Wilcox, and Dodd, and in substance by Miles and Wolf. Alex Wolff initialed for all clearing officials. The memorandum is backdated. Also scheduled for publication in Foreign Relations, 1981-1988, vol. XXXVIII, International Economic Development; International Debt; Foreign Assistance. Wolfowitz sent the memorandum to Eagleburger under an April 23 covering note, writing: "Attached is the paper that you requested on U.S. policy toward the Third World. This whole exercise has brought home the need for a more fundamental look at this issue." (Ibid.) An April 16 draft is ibid.

The common identity provided by anti-colonialism still feeds on powerful currents of national pride and historic resentment but it increasingly is overshadowed by economic, ideological, religious and other differences. And it should be increasingly clear that the common desire for development and growth is best satisfied neither by autarchy nor a new dependence on redistribution and restriction, but by increased participation in a dynamic international economy.

The conventional concept of North-South relations focuses too narrowly on economic problems. We must also recognize the need for political development in nations whose weak governmental institutions leave them prey to subversion, unable to accommodate legitimate opposition, even willing to accept external intervention or to embark on external aggression.

Nor, finally, can we ignore the imperatives of peace and security. Many of the developing nations face endemic internal and international violence, fueled from many sources—ethnic, religious, economic, ideological, and territorial. This violence threatens all aspirations for economic and political development. It is made even more dangerous by the possibility of additional states acquiring nuclear weapons. And the potential it affords for Soviet exploitation constitutes one of the most serious long-term threats to US and Western security.

US Interests and Objectives

Rejections of conventional stereotypes about North-South relations must not lead us to lose sight of the huge stake that the US has—economic, political, strategic and moral—in the progress of the developing world. Early in this Administration, Secretary Haig announced that promoting peaceful progress in the developing world is one of the four pillars of our foreign policy.²

The US and even more so our industrialized European and Japanese allies have become increasingly dependent on Third World products and markets. Dependency has given way to interdependence as the flows of commodities, manufactured goods, and capital increase in both directions. Protectionism now threatens the interests of all sides.

Frustrated aspirations for development lend instability to many new states and international economic disarray heightens the problem. The results open opportunities for encroachments by the Soviet Union and its radical allies in key strategic areas of the developing world which threaten vital US and Western interests. These threats have involved the West in morally ambiguous interventions not easily explained or understood in open societies. By encouraging a logic of violence in the Third World, the Soviets hope to exploit the resulting moral confusion in the West and to involve us in situations where military hardware and the techniques of repression count for more than diplomatic sophistication and economic development.

The complex and diverse problems of the developing world present not only serious threats but also historic opportunities for the West. As developing nations move beyond the bitter experience of colonialism, they are increasingly likely to reconsider the market-oriented economic models that traditionally have spurred Western growth. They will also look to the West for the aid, trade, capital, training, and technology needed for development. Many are increasingly inclined to accept Western help in negotiating peaceful solutions to their conflicts. They may come to see that Soviet assistance and the socialist model are neither a panacea for underdevelopment nor a spur to political legitimacy or regional security. And they should recognize that the US shows far more respect for the genuine non-alignment that inspired the NAM and for the North-South dialogue proposed by the G77 than does the Soviet Union. US policy must seek to grasp the opportunities that would be lost by a rigid adherence to either North-South or East-West clichés.

A US policy that reflects the diversity and complexity of the developing world cannot be guided by a single goal or rely on a single instrument. Our efforts to promote peaceful progress and to protect Western interests in the developing world require mutually supporting efforts to: (1) foster economic development, (2) support democratic political evolution, (3) resolve or dampen conflicts, and (4) address threats to security.

Basic Policy Approaches

The foregoing analysis suggests the broad strategic objective of US policy toward the Third World—to transform the ground of superpower competition from the logic of violence to the more favorable ground of development.

A. Countering the Logic of Violence

Reagan Administration foreign policy seeks to prevent the logic of violence from perverting Third World aspirations for independence and development. We do this by pursuing both peace and security, by addressing both the indigenous causes of violence and Soviet attempts to exploit them.

1. We pursue peace through structured processes for negotiation and compromise, for example, in the Middle East (Camp David, Habib's ceasefire) and Namibia (Western Contact Group).

2. We bolster security against those who attempt to impose violent solutions by —Supporting international peacekeeping forces (e.g., UN in Lebanon, Cyprus, and Golan Heights, MFO in Sinai, OAU force in Chad).

—strengthening our own military capabilities through our own and NATO rearmament efforts.

—developing the RDF and insuring access to facilities in Kenya, Oman, Somalia, and other countries.

—bolstering the capabilities of threatened Third World states to defend themselves through US and allied security assistance.

—pressing for the withdrawal of Soviet forces from Afghanistan and Vietnamese forces from Kampuchea and the restoration of Afghan and Kampuchean independence.

—acting to counter Soviet proxies and allies such as Cuba, Nicaragua, Ethiopia, Libya, South Yemen and Vietnam and supporting countries threatened by them.

—devising pragmatic nuclear non-proliferation policies to deny weapons to dangerous states (Libya) and reduce the incentive for their acquisition by threatened states (Pakistan).

Countering Soviet intervention in the Third World also helps to promote a more constructive US-Soviet relationship based on restraint, reciprocity, and respect for the independence of others. By settling conflicts and enhancing regional security, we create conditions that prevent Soviet intervention and US-Soviet confrontation.

Peace and security are mutually reinforcing goals: making our friends more secure often makes them more able and willing to take risks for peace and settle their disputes; settling disputes among our friends often makes them more able and willing to cooperate for our common security. At the same time peace and security provide the best environment for economic development and democratic political evolution.

B. Promoting the Logic of Economic and Political Development

The positive objective of our policy is to demonstrate that the West, despite the colonial past, is the best partner in promoting development.

1. Economic development

—At Cancun the President reaffirmed the American interest in and commitment to economic growth in the developing world.

—In following up Cancun, we try to avoid fruitless “North-South” polemics and to ensure that any “global negotiations” protect the integrity of existing international financial institutions.

—We maintain the US commitment to bilateral ($6.3 billion in FY83) and multilateral ($1.8 billion) economic assistance, but restructuring it to focus on areas that are most important to our interests, to maximize the effectiveness of free enterprise, and to encourage LDC policies conducive to growth. Early emphasis on Jamaica ($112 million) and the CBI ($660 million) exemplify our approach.³

—We promote trade, private investment, and reliance on free markets, which together with US programs for technology transfer, institution building, and training are indispensable keys to economic growth without which aid alone is ineffective.

—We place emphasis on agriculture, focus concessional assistance on poorer LDCs, and maintain assistance to voluntary family planning programs where appropriate. In many countries, unprecedented population growth, resulting in a doubling of population in two–three decades, has implications for both political and economic stability.

—Our assistance is closely integrated with our other objectives: supporting democratic development (El Salvador—$226 million), promoting peaceful settlements (Egypt—[illegible] billion and Israel—$2.5 billion; Zimbabwe—$78 million); bolstering security against Soviet or proxy threats (Pakistan—$532 million; Tunisia—$154 million; Somalia—$9 million; Sudan—$230 million).

—We remain faithful to traditional American humanitarian objectives (largest donor to African, Afghan refugees—$419 million for migration and refugee assistance).

—The result of our reshaped approach and of the President's personal commitment was the first passage of a foreign assistance bill by Congress in three years.⁴

2. Democratic evolution

—We have adopted a pragmatic human rights policy aimed at producing results, preferably through traditional diplomacy that emphasizes respect for human rights as a foundation for political cohesion and for better relations with the US.

—In El Salvador we have supported free elections and efforts to curb human rights abuses.

—The Caribbean Basin Initiative is designed partly to encourage and protect promising democratic institutions in Jamaica, Costa Rica, Honduras and elsewhere in the Caribbean and Central America.

—In Liberia we are assisting efforts to return to civilian rule.

³ See Document 82. The administration transmitted the proposed Caribbean Basin Initiative legislation to Congress on March 17. For the President's remarks upon signing a message to Congress submitting the legislation and the text of his message, see Public Papers: Reagan, 1982, Book I, pp. 312–317.

⁴ See footnote 3, Document 77.

C. Fostering Allied and Regional Cooperation

In seeking to counter the logic of violence and promote the logic of development we cooperate with our allies and with regional groups and powers.

—In the CBI, we cooperate with Canada, Mexico, Venezuela and Colombia, as well as the other nations of the Caribbean region.

—We work with the Central American Democratic Community to promote economic development, democracy, and security.

—We work with ASEAN on Kampuchea, the OAS on Central America, and the OAU'S peacekeeping force in Chad.

—We seek to build our strategic association with China while maintaining the security of all our traditional friends in Asia.

—We encourage prosperous friends to provide needed assistance such as Japan to Egypt and Pakistan or Saudi Arabia to Sudan.

98. Memorandum From the President's Assistant for National Security Affairs (Clark) to President Reagan¹

Washington, April 27, 1982

SUBJECT

Strategy for Building Democracy in Communist and Non-Communist Countries

Issue: Should you approve Al Haig's idea of a study on building democracy in other countries?

Facts: Al earlier sent you a memorandum on his idea for establishing a government/private body to work openly building democratic institutions in other countries.² You were interested in the proposal, but wanted some more thinking done on it before you approved.

Discussion: Attached is a follow-up memorandum from State explaining the idea more fully.³ The concept is a government/private group which would provide training to potential leaders in non-democratic countries—both non-communist and communist—in building the elements of the democratic process: media, trade unions, political parties, etc. This body would not only provide practical and theoretical training here in the United States for those leaders, but might also provide assistance when they returned to their countries. Right now our foreign policy tools in this area are limited to government to government aid, and covert activities. This institute would enable us to nurture democratic institutions but without being as susceptible to the vicissitudes of our bilateral relationships.

There are many more questions to be answered about this concept before it becomes reality. State therefore recommends that it be initially announced as a concept and study in your speech in London on June 6.⁴ It will be one of the new initiatives of this speech, whose overall theme will be the bright future of democracy. There is already enthusiasm for this idea in both Republican and Democratic national parties, within Congress and in organized labor. Once you approve the concept, State would do the necessary behind-the-scenes work to set the stage for your London speech.

Recommendation:

OK NO

_____ _____ That you approve the proposal by State for a study on a "Strategy for Building Democracy."⁵

³ Not attached at Tab A. Reference is to Bremer's April 13 memorandum to Clark; see footnote 4, Document 93.

⁴ For the President's address to members of the British Parliament on June 8, see Document 104.

⁵ The President initialed "RR" and placed a checkmark next to the "OK" recommendation. In a May 10 memorandum to Bremer, Wheeler indicated that the President had "approved the concept of such a study," adding: "He has not decided on the form of public announcement of this initiative, whether it will be in his speech to Parliament, or in some other fashion. The Department is therefore directed to form the study group and draw up terms of reference. A decision on the method of formally announcing the initiative is pending." 99. Address by President Reagan¹

Eureka, Illinois, May 9, 1982

Address at Commencement Exercises at Eureka College in Illinois

President Gilbert,² trustees, administration and faculty, students, and the friends of Eureka College, and particularly those whose day this is, the graduating class of '82:

Dan, you said the 25th and now the 50th. Do you mind if I try for the 75th?³

But it goes without saying that this is a very special day for you who are graduating. Would you forgive me if I say it's a very special day for me also? Over the years since I sat where you, the graduating class of 1982, are now sitting, I've returned to the campus many times, always with great pleasure and warm nostalgia. Now, it just isn't true that I only came back this time to clean out my gym locker. [Laughter]

On one of those occasions, as you've been told, I addressed a graduating class here, "'neath the elms," and was awarded an honorary degree. And at that time I informed those assembled that while I was grateful for the honor, it added to a feeling of guilt I'd been nursing for 25 years, because I always figured the first degree they gave me was honorary. [Laughter]

Now, if it's true that tradition is the glue holding civilization together, then Eureka has made its contribution to that effort. Yes, it is a small college in a small community. It's no impersonal, assembly-line diploma mill. As the years pass, if you have let yourselves absorb the spirit and tradition of this place, you'll find the 4 years you've spent here living in your memory as a rich and important part of your life.

¹Source: Public Papers: Reagan, 1982, Book I, pp. 580–586. All brackets are in the original. The President spoke at 3:23 p.m. in the Reagan Physical Education Center. The Department provided the text of talking points outlining the major themes of the President's address to all European diplomatic posts in telegram 127094, May 11. (Department of State, Central Foreign Policy File, Electronic Telegrams, D820245–0130) In his personal diary entry for May 9, the President wrote: "Left at 1:20 for Peoria. Helicoptered right to the Reagan field house at Eureka—donned robe and addressed the graduation gathering class of '82. Used the occasion to launch our START program for reducing nuclear weapons for Russia & U.S. It was well received. Helicoptered back to Peoria—met with Class of '32 reunion (my class). A big turnout considering only 37 remain alive out of 45. Then met with Scholarship Committee raising funds for program in my name." (Brinkley, ed., The Reagan Diaries, vol. I, January 1981–October 1985, p. 130)

²President of Eureka College Daniel Gilbert.

³The President was commemorating the 50th anniversary of his graduation from Eureka College. [Footnote is in the original.]

Oh, you'll have some regrets along with the happy memories. I let football and other extracurricular activities eat into my study time with the result that my grade average was closer to the C level required for eligibility than it was to straight A's. And even now I wonder what I might have accomplished if I'd studied harder. [Laughter]

Now, I know there are differences between the Eureka College of 1932 and the Eureka of 1982, but I'm also sure that in many ways—important ways—Eureka remains the same. For one thing, it's impossible for you now to believe what I've said about things being the same. We who preceded you understand that very well, because when we were here, we thought old grads who came back only after 5 years—not 50—couldn't understand what our life was like and what had taken place and changed. So, take my word for it. As the years go by, you'll be amazed at how fresh the memory of these years will remain in your minds, how easily you can relive the very emotions that you experienced.

The Class of '32 has no yearbook to record our final days on the campus. The Class of '33 didn't put out a Prism because of the hardships of that Great Depression era. The faculty sometimes went for months on end without pay. And yet this school made it possible for young men and women, myself included, to get an education even though we were totally without funds, our families destitute victims of the Depression. Yes, this place is deep in my heart. Everything that has been good in my life began here.

Graduation Day is called "Commencement," and properly so, because it is both a recognition of completion and a beginning. And I would like, seriously, to talk to you about this new phase—the society in which you're now going to take your place as full-time participants. You're no longer observers. You'll be called upon to make decisions and express your views on global events, because those events will affect your lives.

I've spoken of similarities, and the 1980's like the 1930's may be one of those—a crucial juncture in history that will determine the direction of the future.

In about a month I will meet in Europe with the leaders of nations who are our closest friends and allies. At Versailles, leaders of the industrial powers of the world will seek better ways to meet today's economic challenges. In Bonn, I will join my colleagues from the Atlantic Alliance nations to renew those ties which have been the foundation of Western, free-world defense for 37 years. There will also be meetings in Rome and London.

Now, these meetings are significant for a simple but very important reason: Our own nation's fate is directly linked to that of our sister democracies in Western Europe. The values for which America and all democratic nations stand represent the culmination of Western culture. Andrei Sakharov, the distinguished Nobel Laureate and courageous Soviet human rights advocate, has written in a message smuggled to freedom, "I believe in Western man. I have faith in his mind which is practical and efficient and, at the same time, aspires to great goals. I have faith in his good intentions and in his decisiveness."⁴

This glorious tradition requires a partnership to preserve and protect it. Only as partners can we hope to achieve the goal of a peaceful community of nations. Only as partners can we defend the values of democracy and human dignity that we hold so dear.

There's a single, major issue in our partnership which will underlie the discussions that I will have with the European leaders: the future of Western relations with the Soviet Union. How should we deal with the Soviet Union in the years ahead? What framework should guide our conduct and our policies toward it? And what can we realistically expect from a world power of such deep fears, hostilities, and external ambitions?

I believe the unity of the West is the foundation for any successful relationship with the East. Without Western unity, we'll squander our energies in bickering while the Soviets continue as they please. With unity, we have the strength to moderate Soviet behavior. We've done so in the past, and we can do so again.

Our challenge is to establish a framework in which sound East-West relations will endure. I'm optimistic that we can build a more constructive relationship with the Soviet Union. To do so, however, we must understand the nature of the Soviet system and the lessons of the past.

The Soviet Union is a huge empire ruled by an elite that holds all power and all privilege, and they hold it tightly because, as we've seen in Poland, they fear what might happen if even the smallest amount of control slips from their grasp. They fear the infectiousness of even a little freedom, and because of this in many ways their system has failed. The Soviet empire is faltering because it is rigid—centralized control has destroyed incentives for innovation, efficiency, and individual achievement. Spiritually, there is a sense of malaise and resentment.

But in the midst of social and economic problems, the Soviet dictatorship has forged the largest armed force in the world. It has done so by preempting the human needs of its people, and, in the end, this course will undermine the foundations of the Soviet system. Harry Truman was right when he said of the Soviets that, "When you try to conquer other people or extend yourself over vast areas you cannot win in the long run.”

Yet Soviet aggressiveness has grown as Soviet military power has increased. To compensate, we must learn from the lessons of the past. When the West has stood unified and firm, the Soviet Union has taken heed. For 35 years Western Europe has lived free despite the shadow of Soviet military might. Through unity, you’ll remember from your modern history courses, the West secured the withdrawal of occupation forces from Austria and the recognition of its rights in Berlin.

Other Western policies have not been successful. East-West trade was expanded in hope of providing incentives for Soviet restraint, but the Soviets exploited the benefits of trade without moderating their behavior. Despite a decade of ambitious arms control efforts, the Soviet buildup continues. And despite its signature of the Helsinki agreements on human rights, the Soviet Union has not relaxed its hold on its own people or those of Western [Eastern]⁵ Europe.

During the 1970’s, some of us forgot the warning of President Kennedy, who said that the Soviets “have offered to trade us an apple for an orchard. We don’t do that in this country.”⁶ But we came perilously close to doing just that.

If East-West relations in the détente era in Europe have yielded disappointment, détente outside of Europe has yielded a severe disillusionment for those who expected a moderation of Soviet behavior. The Soviet Union continues to support Vietnam in its occupation of Kampuchea and its massive military presence in Laos. It is engaged in a war of aggression against Afghanistan. Soviet proxy forces have brought instability and conflict to Africa and Central America.

We are now approaching an extremely important phase in East-West relations as the current Soviet leadership is succeeded by a new generation. Both the current and the new Soviet leadership should realize aggressive policies will meet a firm Western response. On the other hand, a Soviet leadership devoted to improving its people’s lives, rather than expanding its armed conquests, will find a sympathetic partner in the West. The West will respond with expanded trade and other forms of cooperation. But all of this depends on Soviet actions. Standing in the Athenian marketplace 2,000 years ago, Demosthenes said, “What sane man would let another man’s words rather than his deeds proclaim who is at peace and who is at war with him?”

⁶ Kennedy expressed this view during an October 6, 1961, meeting with Gromyko. The memorandum of conversation is printed in Foreign Relations, 1961–1963, vol. XIV, Berlin Crisis, 1961–1962, Document 170.

Peace is not the absence of conflict, but the ability to cope with conflict by peaceful means. I believe we can cope. I believe that the West can fashion a realistic, durable policy that will protect our interests and keep the peace, not just for this generation but for your children and your grandchildren.

I believe such a policy consists of five points: military balance, economic security, regional stability, arms reductions, and dialog. Now, these are the means by which we can seek peace with the Soviet Union in the years ahead. Today, I want to set this five-point program to guide the future of our East-West relations, set it out for all to hear and see.

First, a sound East-West military balance is absolutely essential. Last week NATO published a comprehensive comparison of its forces with those of the Warsaw Pact.⁷ Its message is clear: During the past decade, the Soviet Union has built up its forces across the board. During that same period, the defense expenditures of the United States declined in real terms. The United States has already undertaken steps to recover from that decade of neglect. And I should add that the expenditures of our European allies have increase slowly but steadily, something we often fail to recognize here at home.

The second point on which we must reach consensus with our allies deals with economic security. Consultations are under way among Western nations on the transfer of militarily significant technology and the extension of financial credits to the East, as well as on the question of energy dependence on the East, that energy dependence of Europe. We recognize that some of our allies' economic requirements are distinct from our own. But the Soviets must not have access to Western technology with military applications, and we must not subsidize the Soviet economy. The Soviet Union must make the difficult choices brought on by its military budgets and economic shortcomings.

The third element is regional stability with peaceful change. Last year, in a speech in Philadelphia and in the summit meetings at Cancún, I outlined the basic American plan to assist the developing world. These principles for economic development remain the foundation of our approach. They represent no threat to the Soviet Union. Yet in many areas of the developing world we find that Soviet arms and Soviet supported troops are attempting to destabilize societies and extend Moscow's influence.

⁷ Reference is to NATO and the Warsaw Pact: Force Comparisons. The report was issued on May 4 at NATO headquarters in Brussels. Luns, "in introducing the study, remarked that the comparisons 'do not make comfortable reading.'" (David Fouquet, "NATO's own comparison with Warsaw Pact strength puts East ahead," Christian Science Monitor, May 5, 1982, p. 6)

High on our agenda must be progress toward peace in Afghanistan. The United States is prepared to engage in a serious effort to negotiate an end to the conflict caused by the Soviet invasion of that country. We are ready to cooperate in an international effort to resolve this problem, to secure a full Soviet withdrawal from Afghanistan, and to ensure self-determination for the Afghan people.

In southern Africa, working closely with our Western allies and the African States, we've made real progress toward independence for Namibia. These negotiations, if successful, will result in peaceful and secure conditions throughout southern Africa. The simultaneous withdrawal of Cuban forces from Angola is essential to achieving Namibian independence, as well as creating long-range prospects for peace in the region.

Central America also has become a dangerous point of tension in East-West relations. The Soviet Union cannot escape responsibility for the violence and suffering in the region caused by accelerated transfer of advanced military equipment to Cuba.

However, it was in Western Europe—or Eastern Europe, I should say, that the hopes of the 1970's were greatest, and it's there that they have been the most bitterly disappointed. There was hope that the people of Poland could develop a freer society. But the Soviet Union has refused to allow the people of Poland to decide their own fate, just as it refused to allow the people of Hungary to decide theirs in 1956, or the people of Czechoslovakia in 1968.⁸

If martial law in Poland is lifted, if all the political prisoners are released, and if a dialog is restored with the Solidarity Union, the United States is prepared to join in a program of economic support. Water cannons and clubs against the Polish people are hardly the kind of dialog that gives us hope. It's up to the Soviets and their client regimes to show good faith by concrete actions.

The fourth point is arms reduction. I know that this weighs heavily on many of your minds. In our 1931 Prism, we quoted Carl Sandburg, who in his own beautiful way quoted the Mother Prairie, saying, "Have you seen a red sunset drip over one of my cornfields, the shore of night stars, the wave lines of dawn up a wheat valley?"⁹ What an idyllic scene that paints in our minds—and what a nightmarish prospect that a huge mushroom cloud might someday destroy such beauty. My duty as President is to ensure that the ultimate nightmare never occurs, that the prairies and the cities and the people who inhabit them remain free and untouched by nuclear conflict.

⁸ See footnote 5, Document 95 and footnote 4, Document 8.

⁹ Reference is to Sandburg's 1918 poem entitled "Prairie."

I wish more than anything there were a simple policy that would eliminate that nuclear danger. But there are only difficult policy choices through which we can achieve a stable nuclear balance at the lowest possible level.

I do not doubt that the Soviet people, and yes, the Soviet leaders have an overriding interest in preventing the use of unclear weapons. The Soviet Union within the memory of its leaders has known the devastation of total conventional war and knows that nuclear war would be even more calamitous. And yet, so far, the Soviet Union has used arms control negotiations primarily as an instrument to restrict U.S. defense programs and, in conjunction with their own arms buildup, a means to enhance Soviet power and prestige.

Unfortunately, for some time suspicions have grown that the Soviet Union has not been living up to its obligations under existing arms control treaties. There is conclusive evidence the Soviet Union has provided toxins to the Laotians and Vietnamese for use against defenseless villagers in Southeast Asia. And the Soviets themselves are employing chemical weapons on the freedom-fighters in Afghanistan.¹⁰

We must establish firm criteria for arms control in the 1980's if we're to secure genuine and lasting restraint on Soviet military programs throughout arms control. We must seek agreements which are verifiable, equitable, and militarily significant. Agreements that provide only the appearance of arms control breed dangerous illusions.

Last November, I committed the United States to seek significant reductions on nuclear and conventional forces. In Geneva, we have since proposed limits on U.S. and Soviet intermediate-range missiles, including the complete elimination of the most threatening systems on both sides.¹¹ In Vienna, we're negotiating, together with our allies, for reductions of conventional forces in Europe. In the 40-nation Committee

¹⁰ On March 22, Haig transmitted to Congress Special Report #98 entitled "Chemical Warfare in Southeast Asia and Afghanistan." Copies were also sent to the UN Secretary-General and UN members. In a March 22 statement made before news correspondents, Stoessel discussed the report's conclusions, noting: "Toxins and other chemical warfare agents have been developed in the Soviet Union, provided to the Lao and Vietnamese either directly or through the transfer of know-how, and fabricated into weapons with Soviet assistance in Laos, Vietnam, and Kampuchea. In Afghanistan, Soviet forces have used a variety of lethal and non-lethal chemical agents on resistance forces and Afghan villages since the Soviet invasion in December 1979. In addition, there is some evidence that Afghan Government forces may have used Soviet-supplied chemical weapons against the freedom fighters even before the Soviet invasion." on Disarmament, the United Nations [United States]¹² seeks a total ban on all chemical weapons.

Since the first days of my administration, we've been working on our approach to the crucial issue of strategic arms and the control and negotiations for control of those arms with the Soviet Union. The study and analysis required has been complex and difficult. It had to be undertaken deliberately, thoroughly, and correctly. We've laid a solid basis for these negotiations. We're consulting with congressional leaders and with our allies, and we are now ready to proceed.

The main threat to peace posed by nuclear weapons today is the growing instability of the nuclear balance. This is due to the increasingly destructive potential of the massive Soviet buildup in its ballistic missile force.

Therefore, our goal is to enhance deterrence and achieve stability through significant reductions in the most destabilizing nuclear systems, ballistic missiles, and especially the giant intercontinental ballistic missiles, while maintaining a nuclear capability sufficient to deter conflict, to underwrite our national security, and to meet our commitment to allies and friends.

For the immediate future, I'm asking my START—and START really means—we've given up on SALT—START means "Strategic Arms Reduction Talks," and that negotiating team to propose to their Soviet counterparts a practical, phased reduction plan. The focus of our efforts will be to reduce significantly the most destabilizing systems, the ballistic missiles, the number of warheads they carry, and their overall destructive potential.

At the first phase, or the end of the first phase of START, I expect ballistic missile warheads, the most serious threat we face, to be reduced to equal levels, equal ceilings, at least a third below the current levels. To enhance stability, I would ask that no more than half of those warheads be land-based. I hope that these warhead reductions, as well as significant reductions in missiles themselves, could be achieved as rapidly as possible.

In a second phase, we'll seek to achieve an equal ceiling on other elements of our strategic nuclear forces, including limits on the ballistic missile throw-weight at less than current American levels. In both phases, we shall insist on verification procedures to ensure compliance with the agreement.

This, I might say, will be the twentieth time that we have sought such negotiations with the Soviet Union since World War II. The monumental task of reducing and reshaping our strategic forces to enhance stability will take many years of concentrated effort. But I believe that it will be possible to reduce the risks of war by removing the instabilities that now exist and by dismantling the nuclear menace.

I have written to President Brezhnev¹³ and directed Secretary Haig to approach the Soviet Government concerning the initiation of formal negotiations on the reduction of strategic nuclear arms, START, at the earliest opportunity. We hope negotiations will begin by the end of June.¹⁴

We will negotiate seriously, in good faith, and carefully consider all proposals made by the Soviet Union. If they approach these negotiations in the same spirit, I'm confident that together we can achieve an agreement of enduring value that reduces the number of nuclear weapons, halts the growth in strategic forces, and opens the way to even more far-reaching steps in the future.

I hope the Commencement today will also mark the commencement of a new era, in both senses of the word, a new start toward a more peaceful and secure world.

The fifth and final point I propose for East-West relations is dialog. I've always believed that people's problems can be solved when people talk to each other instead of about each other. And I've already expressed my own desire to meet with President Brezhnev in New York next month.¹⁵ If this can't be done, I'd hope we could arrange a future meeting where positive results can be anticipated. And when we sit down, I'll tell President Brezhnev that the United States is ready to build a new understanding based upon the principles I've outlined today.

I'll tell him that his government and his people have nothing to fear from the United States. The free nations living at peace in the world community can vouch for the fact that we seek only harmony. And I'll ¹³The President's May 7 letter to Brezhnev is printed in Foreign Relations, 1981–1988, vol. III, Soviet Union, January 1981–January 1983, Document 166.

¹⁴During his May 31 remarks at Memorial Day ceremonies at Arlington National Cemetery, the President commented: "In the quest for peace, the United States has proposed to the Soviet Union that we reduce the threat of nuclear weapons by negotiating a stable balance at far lower levels of strategic forces. This is a fitting occasion to announce that START, as we call it, strategic arms reductions, that the negotiations between our country and the Soviet Union will begin on the 29th of June." (Public Papers: Reagan, 1982, Book I, p. 709)

¹⁵During his April 5 news conference, the President, when asked if he would "like to meet with Brezhnev," responded: "Well, yes if he—I will answer that one—naturally, head of state that's here in our own country, yes I would very much think that he and I would have a meeting." (Public Papers: Reagan, 1982, Book I, p. 430)

ask President Brezhnev why our two nations can't practice mutual restraint. Why can't our peoples enjoy the benefits that would flow from real cooperation? Why can't we reduce the number of horrendous weapons?

Perhaps I should also speak to him of this school and these graduates who are leaving it today—of your hopes for the future, of your deep desire for peace, and yet your strong commitment to defend your values if threatened. Perhaps if he someday could attend such a ceremony as this, he'd better understand America. In the only system he knows, you would be here by the decision of government, and on this day the government representatives would be here telling most, if not all, of you where you were going to report to work tomorrow.

But as we go to Europe for the talks and as we proceed in the important challenges facing this country, I want you to know that I will be thinking of you and of Eureka and what you represent. In one of my yearbooks, I remember reading that, "The work of the prairie is to be the soil for the growth of a strong Western culture." I believe Eureka is fulfilling that work. You, the members of the 1982 graduating class, are this year's harvest.

I spoke of the difference between our two countries. I try to follow the humor of the Russian people. We don't hear much about the Russian people. We hear about the Russian leaders. But you can learn a lot, because they do have a sense of humor, and you can learn from the jokes they're telling. And one of the most recent jokes I found kind of, well, personally interesting. Maybe you might—tell you something about your country.

The joke they tell is that an American and a Russian were arguing about the differences between our two countries. And the American said, "Look, in my country I can walk into the Oval Office; I can hit the desk with my fist and say, 'President Reagan, I don't like the way you're governing the United States.'" And the Russian said, "I can do that." The American said, "What?" He says, "I can walk into the Kremlin, into Brezhnev's office. I can pound Brezhnev's desk, and I can say, 'Mr. President, I don't like the way Ronald Reagan is governing the United States.'" [Laughter]

Eureka as an institution and you as individuals are sustaining the best of Western man's ideals. As a fellow graduate and in the office I hold, I'll do my best to uphold these same ideals.

To the Class of '82, congratulations, and God bless you.

Updated Strategy for Your Speeches in Europe

In March, I sent you a strategy on four speeches to achieve maximum impact in Europe and the United States.² You indicated overall approval. We are well on track with implementation of that gameplan.

You gave the first speech—on East-West relations and START—in Eureka.³ We have done the substantive groundwork and prepared drafts of the other three speeches. They now are being considered inter-agency and by your personal staff.

The address to Parliament on democracy seeks to get the force of idealism on our side.⁴ It gives us a campaign platform and political action program to rival the Marxist-Leninists and engage youth. You have approved its most important specific initiative—creating a political foundation to offer concrete training and assistance to democratic movements in communist and non-communist countries. We have considerable bipartisan support for the proposal and willingness to participate in the six month study to work out details. Lane Kirkland, DNC Chairman Manatt, and the Chamber of Commerce are on board. Brock and Richards will be working with Manatt to line up the Congressional leadership. We envision an event/announcement on the Hill simultaneous with your address in London.

The address to the Bundestag on peace and security is also well along.⁵ Its central purpose is to set out the foundation for preserving peace. There are two features of particular appeal in Europe: first an emphasis on strengthening conventional defense to reduce the danger that nuclear weapons would be used. And second, announcing our MBFR proposal, which would help bring about equality in conventional forces at lower levels. Our NATO partners are positive about this proposal. Like the Eureka/START speech, this would take another specific step to implement the arms control agenda you set forth last November 18th.⁶

It is striking that we are precisely on track with the gameplan we set out six weeks ago.” (Ibid.)

The briefer statement for Berlin combines the unexpected with the expected.⁷ The surprise will be announcement of a proposal to reduce the danger of accidental nuclear war. This is one of Europe's major pre-occupations. The statement also points out that the causes of tension will not disappear until we have solved the human problems which lay behind them. Thus the second proposal is for a major effort to lower the barriers to human contact. Both this traditional Berlin appeal and the surprise proposal on nuclear accidents will be warmly received in Germany, Europe as a whole, and the United States.

We also have begun work on a fifth speech—your address to the U.N. Special Session on Disarmament.⁸ This would review our overall philosophy about peace and arms reductions, the set of initiatives you already have set forth, and one or more new initiatives with particular attention to verification.

Taken together these five speeches, and the initiatives each of them contains, will give us a "critical mass" over the next two months. They should put us decisively on the offensive. The Soviets will have to scramble hard to catch up—even more than they did after the singular success of your November 18th speech.

⁶See Document 69.

⁷On June 11 in Berlin, the President offered remarks at Charlottenburg Palace. After stating that he remained "determined to assure that our civilization averts the catastrophe of a nuclear war," Reagan said: "Past agreements have created the hot line between Moscow and Washington, established measures to reduce the danger of nuclear accidents, and provided for notification of some missile launches. We are now studying other concrete and practical steps to help further reduce the risk of a nuclear conflict which I intend to explore with the Soviet Union. It is time we went further to avert the risk of war through accident or misunderstanding. We shortly will approach the Soviet Union with proposals in such areas as notification of strategic exercises, of missile launches, and expanded exchange of strategic forces data. Taken together, these steps would represent a qualitative improvement in the nuclear environment. They would help reduce the chances of misinterpretation in the case of exercises and test launches. And they would reduce the secrecy and ambiguity which surround military activity. We are considering additional measures as well." (Public Papers: Reagan, 1982, Book I, pp. 767–768)

101. Editorial Note

On May 13, 1982, President Ronald Reagan began his 8 p.m. news conference, held in the East Room of the White House, by reading a statement on arms control: “Four times in my life, I have seen America plunged into war—twice as part of tragic global conflicts that cost the lives of millions. Living through that experience has convinced me that America’s highest mission is to stand as a leader among the free nations in the cause of peace. And that’s why, hand in hand with our efforts to restore a credible national defense, my administration has been actively working for a reduction in nuclear and conventional forces that can help free the world from the threat of destruction.

“In Geneva, the United States is now negotiating with the Soviet Union on a proposal I set forward last fall to reduce drastically the level of nuclear armament in Europe. In Vienna, we and our NATO allies are negotiating with the Warsaw Pact over ways to reduce conventional forces in Europe.

“Last Sunday [May 9], I proposed a far-reaching approach to nuclear arms control—a phased reduction in strategic weapons beginning with those that are most dangerous and destabilizing, the warheads on ballistic missiles and especially those on intercontinental ballistic missiles.

“Today the United States and the Soviet Union each have about 7,500 nuclear warheads poised on missiles that can reach their targets in a matter of minutes. In the first phase of negotiations, we want to focus on lessening this imminent threat. We seek to reduce the number of ballistic missile warheads to about 5,000—one-third less than today’s levels—limit the number of warheads on land-based missiles to half that number, and cut the total number of all ballistic missiles to an equal level—about one-half that of the current U.S. level.

“In the second phase, we’ll seek reductions to equal levels of throwweight, a critical indicator of overall destructive potential of missiles. To be acceptable, a new arms agreement with the Soviets must be balanced, equal, and verifiable. And most important, it must increase stability and the prospects of peace.

“I have already written President Brezhnev and instructed Secretary Haig to approach the Soviet Government so that we can begin formal negotiations on the reduction of strategic nuclear arms—the START talks—at the earliest opportunity. And we hope that these negotiations can begin by the end of June and hope to hear from President Brezhnev in the near future.

“Reaching an agreement with the Soviets will not be short or easy work. We know that from the past. But I believe that the Soviet people and their leaders understand the importance of preventing war. And I believe that a firm, forthright American position on arms reductions can bring us closer to a settlement.

"Tonight, I want to renew my pledge to the American people and to the people of the world that the United States will do everything we can to bring such an agreement about.

"And now I guess it's time for us to return to the conventional skirmishing, the question time."

After fielding a question about unemployment, the President called on Helen Thomas of United Press International. Thomas asked: "Mr. President, if wiping out the nuclear threat is so important to the world, why do you choose to ignore 7 long years of negotiation, in which two Republican Presidents played a part? I speak of SALT II. We abide by the terms the Soviet Union does. Why not push for a ratification of that treaty as a first step, then go on to START? After all, a bird in hand."

Reagan responded: "Because, Helen, this bird isn't a very friendly bird. I remind you that a Democratic-controlled Senate refused to ratify it. And the reason for refusing to ratify, I think, is something we can't—"

After an unidentified person said: "[Inaudible] —Republican Senate now," Reagan continued: "Well, but we can't ignore that, the reason why it was refused ratification. SALT stands for strategic arms limitation. And the limitation in that agreement would allow in the life of the treaty for the Soviet Union to just about double their present nuclear capability. It would allow—and does allow—us to increase ours. In other words, it simply legitimizes an arms race.

"Now, the parts that we're observing of that have to do with the monitoring of each other's weaponry, and so both aides are doing that. What we're striving for is to reduce the power, the number, and particularly those destabilizing missiles that can be touched off by the push of a button—to reduce the number of those. And there just is no ratio between that and what SALT was attempting to do. I think SALT was the wrong course to follow." (Public Papers: Reagan, 1982, Book II, pages 618 and 619; brackets in the original)

The news conference was broadcast live on radio and television. For the complete text of the news conference, see ibid., pages 618–626. It is also printed in Weekly Compilation of Presidential Documents, May 17, 1982, vol. 18, no. 19, pages 634–642. In his personal diary entry for May 13, the President wrote: "Held 8 P.M. press conference. The Lord watched over me. I knew it was a good one. Even the press had good things to say about it." President's Meeting with George Shultz

President Ronald Reagan
George Shultz
Donald Regan, Secretary of the Treasury
Walter J. Stoessel, Acting Secretary of State

After an exchange of greetings the President asked Mr. Shultz for his report on the trip that Mr. Shultz had just completed on the President's behalf.²

Mr. Shultz handed the President a memorandum summarizing his conversations³ and also handed the President a speech given by Helmut Schmidt which Shultz said was particularly impressive.

Mr. Shultz reported that all of his interlocutors were looking to the June Summits for an expression of Western unity, in particular as President Mitterrand and Prime Minister Suzuki said the Summits must demonstrate unity and strength to "the other side." The Summit

² In telegram 121638 to Ottawa, Tokyo, and multiple European diplomatic posts, May 5, the Department indicated that Shultz would be planning a "private trip" to Ottawa, Paris, Bonn, Rome, Tokyo, London, and Brussels, departing Washington that day. The Department noted in response to speculation regarding the trip that press guidance had been prepared. That guidance read, in part: "As you know, Mr. Shultz is the Chairman of the President's Economic Advisory Board. In view of the difficult economic problems to be discussed at Versailles and on other stops during the President's European trip, the President has shared his thinking on the economic summit with Mr. Shultz and, at Secretary Haig's suggestion, asked him to meet with the leaders of some of our major economic partners." meetings must also display a sense of realism recognizing that serious economic problems exist but that the Western societies are capable of dealing with these problems.

Mr. Shultz reported that Mitterrand clearly wants to place the emphasis on the meetings of principals alone over meals. Mitterrand was reported to be holding a competition to find the five best French chefs under the age of 45 to prepare the five meals during the Summit as a demonstration of the importance he attaches to the private discussions at the meals. Mitterrand expects hard, candid conversations during the meetings but intends that the communique show unity and a sense that the leaders are constructively grappling with the problems. Mr. Shultz reported that the other heads of state and government are looking to the U.S. and to the President for leadership at Versailles. He quoted Helmut Schmidt as saying that while the President must act as one among equals ("as he so well does") he is more than that. He must be the leader and Schmidt pledged to follow that lead.

Mr. Shultz reported successively on the major topics for the Versailles Summit:

—High U.S. Interest Rates: In Europe, Japan and Canada Mr. Shultz encountered great concern about the level of U.S. real interest rates. He found a common line of reasoning which begins with high interest rates slowing U.S. growth, influencing interest rates abroad because of the limited room for maneuver on exchange rates; thus slowing growth outside the U.S. causing a general economic slowdown and higher unemployment on a global scale. This chain of events is universally ascribed to U.S. budget deficits. How to address U.S. deficits however varies even within governments, Shultz reported. He said that Thatcher welcomed the President's emphasis on cutting expenditures and his refusal to raise taxes to promote budget balance whereas Chancellor Howe felt that balance was most important, leading him to advocate "whatever is necessary" to eliminate the deficits. Mr. Shultz told the President that while he felt there was an element of truth in the foregoing line of reasoning there was also a serious weakness. Differing economic conditions as reflected in Italian inflation rates triple those in the U.S. and German rates half those in the U.S., indicate that all economic problems for others will not disappear when U.S. interest rates come down. He urged the President to make the point at Versailles that lower U.S. rates will not be a panacea for the world. He also told the President that his colleagues at Versailles will be especially interested in the President's views on the budget battle and on the U.S. economic outlook.

He added that all of the other leaders want to fight inflation but that they desperately need growth. He reported that Trudeau was clearly the most worried of all the heads of state that he met. He described a three-way conversation between himself, Trudeau and Ian Stewart (Deputy Finance Minister) in which Stewart described Canada as moving toward economic catastrophe with rampant bankruptcies and Trudeau asked if the same conditions did not exist in the U.S. and elsewhere. Trudeau said that Canada has no more time to wait, the economy is in desperate shape and he is led to ask the question “are my policies at fault?” Based on this conversation Shultz suggested that Trudeau may be the most difficult leader to handle at Versailles.

Mr. Shultz reported that as he got further into his trip he identified a growth theme that could bring some of the various participants together. Nothing that Suzuki had made a proposal in the area of technological cooperation, that Mitterrand would make a report to the Summit on technology and that the President’s program was focusing on increased savings and investment in the U.S., Shultz felt that a theme promoting higher growth and lower inflation through investment and technology could be useful in addressing the various concerns at Versailles. He cited two dangers with this approach: (1) high interest rates damage investment, thus drawing more attention to U.S. interest rates and (2) a debate over the relative merits of public versus private investment would be inevitable.

—Policy Coordination: Mr. Shultz reported that the President’s initiative on policy coordination (as indeed his letter on the Versailles and NATO Summits) was well received. Although the Europeans see the limits to coordination as a result of their frequent efforts in this area within the Community, they also understand the usefulness of greater knowledge and frequent communication to get the message “into the gut, not just the head.” Mr. Shultz felt that this better understanding can soften the edges during a period of difficult international economic relations.

For the Europeans and the Japanese the number one topic on coordination is exchange rates. Mr. Shultz reported that U.S. policy is uniformly perceived opposing intervention in all circumstances. This has resulted in an impression that the U.S. “doesn’t care about” the exchange markets. The Europeans above all are pleading for a different rhetoric. Mr. Shultz added that there was much to commend a different tone in stating our intervention policy.

Mr. Shultz described three schools of thought on exchange rates. The first, subscribed to by Schmidt, Spadolini, Thatcher and Thorn, agrees that intervention cannot counteract basic market trends but that smoothing operations are useful to show the interest of governments in well-functioning markets. The second, subscribed to primarily by Mitterrand, goes much further and believes that basic values can be influenced by intervention. Mrs. Thatcher remarked that such an approach would “simply throw money to the speculators.” The third view, subscribed to by Suzuki (reportedly on the basis of a plan developed by Miyazawa), suggests bilateral efforts to influence exchange markets by means not limited to intervention. Suzuki has written to the President proposing joint study of such efforts. Mr. Shultz reported his own impression that the Japanese seem to be able to influence the value of the yen when they decided it should be done. At the moment they have in mind a yen rate of 210 to the dollar and Shultz wonders whether they are looking to put a "political face" on a decision they have already taken. Mr. Shultz urged that the President pursue the Suzuki proposal in part because Shultz has great admiration for Miyazawa.

—Trade: Mr. Shultz reported that all of his interlocutors were concerned about rising protectionism. He added that he personally thought this was the most threatening thing on the horizon. Shultz outlined two possible strategies: One, expressed most clearly by Mitterrand, called for putting all the protectionist measures on the table and developing a plan to deal with current problems and to reverse the trend toward more protection. The other, more in keeping with the U.S. initiative, takes a more aggressive approach to extend the principles of free trade to areas not adequately covered. Mr. Shultz told the President that the second approach would require his vigorous personal leadership but would receive the support of Schmidt and perhaps Thatcher.

Mr. Shultz reported that much of the European commentary on trade issues was aimed at Japan. On the other hand, the Japanese complain that they are being "picked on." Mr. Shultz noted that after hearing for 15 years the usual Japanese "small country" approach he had been shocked by Suzuki's opening commentary acknowledging the responsibility of Japan in the global economy. He told the President that Suzuki is very much looking forward to his bilateral at Versailles and counselled the President against joining in any European effort to gang up on Japan. Mr. Shultz noted that most of the world's population is in Asia and that the U.S. would do well to find "common cause" with the Japanese and provide a little "TLC" for Suzuki. Mr. Shultz expressed the opinion that a public rebuke against the Japanese at Versailles would be devastating.

—Credits to the Soviet Union: Mr. Shultz reported his distinct impression that the President had made head-way with the Europeans on the issue of credit subsidies to the Soviet Union. Each of the European leaders acknowledged that they are spending large amounts of money on arms largely because of the threat from the Soviet Union. Why then are they subsidizing the Soviet economy? At the Head of State level, all agree that this is foolish but they continue to do so. Several of them, particularly Thatcher, noted, however, the tendency for others to backslide on agreements; thus the need for some form of machinery to police any eventual agreement on limiting credits. Shultz also conveyed Thorn's impression that sentiment in Europe was swinging toward the U.S. position on credit to the Soviet Union.

Mr. Shultz added that the Europeans differentiate between the Soviet Union and the satellites. On credit issues, however, they all feel that the West is currently over-extended in Eastern Europe and that prudence argues against more lending to Eastern Europe at the present time.

—North/South Relations: As a result of his conversations, Shultz feels that the United States is on one side and everyone else is on the other in dealing with the less developed countries. He said that the leaders with whom he met felt the U.S. is unjustly getting a bad name in the third world. This perception is largely attributable to the U.S. position on global negotiations. All agree that the integrity, independence, etc . . . of the specialized agencies must not be prejudiced but they say that the U.S. is crazy not to go along with global negotiations. Shultz added that he detected a fair degree of cynicism in the European approach to this issue.

Mr. Shultz reported that several leaders, particularly Schmidt and Thorn, cited the value of the Lomé Convention⁴ and its commodity agreements as a useful device in dealing with a major LDC problem. Shultz told the President that he felt this issue needed more study in the U.S. Government and had so indicated to Larry Eagleburger.

—Energy: Mr. Shultz said this was a subject that no one wanted to discuss expect Schmidt, who was concerned that we were getting “too relaxed” on energy and will get “blind-sided” once again. Shultz suggested that the President be prepared with a list of synfuels projects that are going forward on a market basis and a package of energy alternatives for Europe among his briefing materials for Versailles.

On other issues, Shultz noted the Falklands problem as one which particularly concerned Spadolini since about one half of the Argentine population is of Italian descent. More generally, there is widespread concern in Europe that the Falklands will be divisive of the movement toward European unity since it is unlikely that the Community can continue to give full support to the British as the hostilities worsen.

Mr. Shultz informed the President that his proposals on the START negotiations were well received by all, except Trudeau, who has his own ideas on nuclear weapons.

On the NATO Summit agenda, Shultz had only discussed the question of strengthened conventional defenses. It was clear that budgetary considerations would be the primary determinant of European reaction to this proposal. Shultz relayed Thatcher's comment that we be careful not to underrate the Russian technical competence while Schmidt was primarily worried about statements citing Western weaknesses in conventional defense. Schmidt said that, for a front line state, it is demoralizing to hear repeated contentions that the West could not withstand a conventional attack. He added that the German Army was up to the task.

In summary, Shultz told the President that the leaders he had met wanted unity and strength, not confrontation at Versailles. They recognize the need to fight inflation but also desperately need growth. They acknowledge that it is foolish to subsidize the Soviet Union but realize they are doing so. They recognize that the world trading system is deteriorating and that each of them is contributing to its deterioration. In short, they need someone to lift their sights toward a more constructive and positive approach to policy in the future. Shultz told the President that he was elected.

The President thanked and commended Mr. Shultz for his excellent report. He said that in his view most economic problems in Europe were the result of government intervention, and none except Mrs. Thatcher was moving to correct the basic problems. The challenge is to convince the Europeans that the old French king was right when he said: "Laissez faire." Shultz replied that Mitterrand repeatedly referred to De Gaulle in describing his own policies, placing himself in the mainstream of French economic thinking.

In a closing exchange, The President said that Shultz' report "scared him a little." Shultz retorted that he did not want the President to think that Versailles would be "a piece of cake."

Action items: On the basis of Shultz' report, the following action items are indicated:

1. Macroeconomic Policy: Development of a growth theme drawing on the Mitterrand/Suzuki initiatives on technology, and the recognized need for heavy investment activity to facilitate structural adjustment. This theme would be consistent with the Administration's emphasis on growth through private savings, investment and higher productivity.

2. Exchange Rates:

- (a) Exploration of a change in the tone and rhetoric of U.S. exchange market policy, to reflect more positively our willingness to intervene to counter disorderly markets;

- (b) Follow-up on Prime Minister Suzuki's suggestion to President Reagan that we establish a bilateral group to inquire into factors influencing the value of the yen.

3. Trade: Determine whether we could accept President Mitterrand's proposal to "lay all our protectionist practices on the table", and determine jointly how to back away from them.

4. Energy:

(a) Develop a list of market-based synfuels projects;
(b) Provide briefing material for the President on energy alternatives for Europe.

5. North/South: Analyze the STABEX provisions of the Lome Convention, with an eye to an expanded income stabilization scheme.

6. East/West Issues (Soviet credits): Pay careful attention to the problem of backsliding on a credit arrangement, by insisting on a mechanism to police the arrangement.

7. Japan: "Think long and hard" before joining in any effort to gang-up on Japan, or submit it to a public rebuke.

NSDD-32: US National Security Strategy²

The President has recently issued NSDD-32: US National Security Strategy, completing the NSDD-1 study process.³ Although the document is being treated with extreme sensitivity within the Administration, its general contents were briefed in classified session to Congressional committees concerned with defense issues, Judge Clark made a public address on the study at a CSIS gathering on May 21,⁴ and Cap Weinberger discussed it before the Baltimore Council on Foreign Affairs on May 27.

The NSDD-32 decision document begins by stating that the entire 87 page NSSD-1 study (which is appended to NSDD-32) will serve as guidance. It then summarizes each section of the study. It does not set firm guidelines and does not significantly refocus or restructure our national security policy or DOD programming and budgeting. In other words, there are no surprises.

The major conclusions are:

- The Soviets represent the major threat we will face for the next decade. The Soviet military will continue to modernize and expand. While it is unlikely that the Soviets will initiate hostilities with the US, a war with a Soviet client is more likely and could risk a direct US-Soviet confrontation.

- The US must increasingly draw upon the resources and cooperation of allies and others to protect our collective interests. A strong unified NATO remains indispensable to protecting Western interests. Outside Europe the US will place primary reliance on regional states to deal with non-Soviet threats, providing security assistance as appropriate. Against Soviet threats, US forces will be key, and for Southwest Asia we will develop the capability by the end of the FY 1984-1988 FYDP to deploy and sustain seven divisions in the region. (Although the language in NSDD-32 is fairly specific on this latter point, DOD is continuing to object to the seven division force in the context of NSSD-4, the NSC study on Southwest Asian security.)⁵

- Recognizing that strategic decisions will be determined by the situation during hostilities, we will be governed for the present by the following wartime planning priorities: North America, NATO, Southwest Asia, East Asia and the Pacific, and Latin America and Africa.

- Modernization of our strategic nuclear forces and the achievement of nuclear parity with the Soviet Union shall receive first priority in our efforts to rebuild US military capabilities.

⁵ NSSD 4-82, "US Strategy for the Near East and Southwest Asia," issued on March 19; scheduled for publication in Foreign Relations, 1981-1988, vol. XXII, Middle East Region; Arabian Peninsula.

- In a conflict involving the Soviet Union, the US must plan, in conjunction with allies, for a successful conventional defense in a global war. Given current conventional force insufficiency, however, we must plan to focus our forces first in areas of most vital concern, while undertaking lesser operations elsewhere as appropriate. To close the gap between strategy and capabilities, we must undertake a sustained and balanced force development program with readiness as first priority, followed by upgrading C³, improving sustainability, increasing mobility, and then modernizing and expanding our forces.

- Security assistance is a vital, integral component of our strategy. A priority effort, involving the White House, shall be made to pass our legislative initiatives. We should also plan for steady real growth in the security assistance budget.

- All defense resources are to be mutually supporting and thoroughly integrated with each other and with other elements of US national power. We must expand the scope of mobilization and industrial capabilities and frequently review manpower policies to ensure adequacy of manpower.

The decision document concludes with a requirement that SecDef and the Chairman include as part of their annual reports on the state of our defenses, a discussion of the progress made in implementing the provisions of NSDD–32. The Department is expected to report periodically on security assistance through the Arms Transfer Management Group. It is unclear what effect this reporting requirement will actually have; but we will monitor the process and keep you informed, particularly with respect to DOD budgeting on the development of forces for Southwest Asia.

104. Address by President Reagan Before the British Parliament¹

London, June 8, 1982

Address to Members of the British Parliament

My Lord Chancellor, Mr. Speaker:

The journey of which this visit forms a part is a long one. Already it has taken me to two great cities of the West, Rome and Paris, and to the economic summit at Versailles.² And there, once again, our sister democracies have proved that even in a time of severe economic strain, free peoples can work together freely and voluntarily to address problems as serious as inflation, unemployment, trade, and economic development in a spirit of cooperation and solidarity.

Other milestones lie ahead. Later this week, in Germany, we and our NATO allies will discuss measures for our joint defense and America's latest initiatives for a more peaceful, secure world through arms reductions.³

Each stop of this trip is important, but among them all, this moment occupies a special place in my heart and in the hearts of my countrymen—a moment of kinship and homecoming in these hallowed halls.

Speaking for all Americans, I want to say how very much at home we feel in your house. Every American would, because this is, as we have been so eloquently told, one of democracy's shrines. Here the rights of free people and the processes of representation have been debated and refined.

It has been said that an institution is the lengthening shadow of a man. This institution is the lengthening shadow of all the men and women who have sat here and all those who have voted to send representation here.

This is my second visit to Great Britain as President of the United States. My first opportunity to stand on British soil occurred almost a year and a half ago when your Prime Minister graciously hosted a diplomatic dinner at the British Embassy in Washington.⁴ Mrs. Thatcher said then that she hoped I was not distressed to find staring down at me from the grand staircase a portrait of His Royal Majesty King George III. She suggested it was best to let bygones be bygones, and in view of our two countries' remarkable friendship in succeeding years, she added that most Englishmen today would agree with Thomas Jefferson that "a little rebellion now and then is a very good thing." [Laughter]

Well, from here I will go to Bonn and then Berlin, where there stands a grim symbol of power untamed. The Berlin Wall, that dreadful gray gash across the city, is in its third decade. It is the fitting signature of the regime that built it.

And a few hundred kilometers behind the Berlin Wall, there is another symbol. In the center of Warsaw, there is a sign that notes the distances to two capitals. In one direction it points toward Moscow. In the other it points toward Brussels, headquarters of Western Europe's tangible unity. The marker says that the distances from Warsaw to Moscow and Warsaw to Brussels are equal. The sign makes this point: Poland is not East or West. Poland is at the center of European civilization. It has contributed mightily to that civilization. It is doing so today by being magnificently unreconciled to oppression.

Poland's struggle to be Poland and to secure the basic rights we often take for granted demonstrates why we dare not take those rights for granted. Gladstone, defending the Reform Bill of 1866, declared, "You cannot fight against the future. Time is on our side." It was easier to believe in the march of democracy in Gladstone's day—in that high noon of Victorian optimism.

We're approaching the end of a bloody century plagued by a terrible political invention—totalitarianism. Optimism comes less easily today, not because democracy is less vigorous, but because democracy's enemies have refined their instruments of repression. Yet optimism is in order, because day by day democracy is proving itself to be a not-at-all-fragile flower. From Stettin on the Baltic to Varna on the Black Sea, the regimes planted by totalitarianism have had more than 30 years to establish their legitimacy. But none—not one regime—has yet been able to risk free elections. Regimes planted by bayonets do not take root.

The strength of the Solidarity movement in Poland demonstrates the truth told in an underground joke in the Soviet Union. It is that the Soviet Union would remain a one-party nation even if an opposition party were permitted, because everyone would join the opposition party. [Laughter]

America's time as a player on the stage of world history has been brief. I think understanding this fact has always made you patient with your younger cousins—well, not always patient. I do recall that on one occasion, Sir Winston Churchill said in exasperation about one of our most distinguished diplomats: "He is the only case I know of a bull who carries his china shop with him." [Laughter]

But witty as Sir Winston was, he also had that special attribute of great statesmen—the gift of vision, the willingness to see the future based on the experience of the past. It is this sense of history, this understanding of the past that I want to talk with you about today, for it is in remembering what we share of the past that our two nations can make common cause for the future.

We have not inherited an easy world. If developments like the Industrial Revolution, which began here in England, and the gifts of science and technology have made life much easier for us, they have also made it more dangerous. There are threats now to our freedom, indeed to our very existence, that other generations could never even have imagined.

There is first the threat of global war. No President, no Congress, no Prime Minister, no Parliament can spend a day entirely free of this threat. And I don't have to tell you that in today's world the existence of nuclear weapons could mean, if not the extinction of mankind, then surely the end of civilization as we know it. That's why negotiations on intermediate-range nuclear forces now underway in Europe and the START talks—Strategic Arms Reduction Talks—which will begin later this month, are not just critical to American or Western policy; they are critical to mankind. Our commitment to early success in these negotiations is firm and unshakable, and our purpose is clear: reducing the risk of war by reducing the means of waging war on both sides.

At the same time there is a threat posed to human freedom by the enormous power of the modern state. History teaches the dangers of government that overreaches—political control taking precedence over free economic growth, secret police, mindless bureaucracy, all combining to stifle individual excellence and personal freedom.

Now, I'm aware that among us here and throughout Europe there is legitimate disagreement over the extent to which the public sector should play a role in a nation's economy and life. But on one point all of us are united—our abhorrence of dictatorship in all its forms, but most particularly totalitarianism and the terrible inhumanities it has caused in our time—the great purge, Auschwitz and Dachau, the Gulag, and Cambodia.

Historians looking back at our time will note the consistent restraint and peaceful intentions of the West. They will note that it was the democracies who refused to use the threat of their nuclear monopoly in the forties and early fifties for territorial or imperial gain. Had that nuclear monopoly been in the hands of the Communist world, the map of Europe—indeed, the world—would look very different today. And certainly they will note it was not the democracies that invaded Afghanistan or suppressed Polish Solidarity or used chemical and toxin warfare in Afghanistan and Southeast Asia.

If history teaches anything it teaches self-delusion in the face of unpleasant facts is folly. We see around us today the marks of our terrible dilemma—predictions of doomsday, antinuclear demonstrations, an arms race in which the West must, for its own protection, be an unwilling participant. At the same time we see totalitarian forces in the world who seek subversion and conflict around the globe to further their barbarous assault on the human spirit. What, then, is our course? Must civilization perish in a hail of fiery atoms? Must freedom wither in a quiet, deadening accommodation with totalitarian evil?

Sir Winston Churchill refused to accept the inevitability of war or even that it was imminent. He said, "I do not believe that Soviet Russia desires war. What they desire is the fruits of war and the indefinite expansion of their power and doctrines. But what we have to consider here today while time remains is the permanent prevention of war and the establishment of conditions of freedom and democracy as rapidly as possible in all countries."

Well, this is precisely our mission today: to preserve freedom as well as peace. It may not be easy to see; but I believe we live now at a turning point.

In an ironic sense Karl Marx was right. We are witnessing today a great revolutionary crisis, a crisis where the demands of the economic order are conflicting directly with those of the political order. But the crisis is happening not in the free, non-Marxist West, but in the home of Marxist-Leninism, the Soviet Union. It is the Soviet Union that runs against the tide of history by denying human freedom and human dignity to its citizens. It also is in deep economic difficulty. The rate of growth in the national product has been steadily declining since the fifties and is less than half of what it was then.

The dimensions of this failure are astounding: A country which employs one-fifth of its population in agriculture is unable to feed its own people. Were it not for the private sector, the tiny private sector tolerated in Soviet agriculture, the country might be on the brink of famine. These private plots occupy a bare 3 percent of the arable land but account for nearly one-quarter of Soviet farm output and nearly one-third of meat products and vegetables. Overcentralized, with little or no incentives, year after year the Soviet system pours its best resource into the making of instruments of destruction. The constant shrinkage of economic growth combined with the growth of military production is putting a heavy strain on the Soviet people. What we see here is a political structure that no longer corresponds to its economic base, a society where productive forces are hampered by political ones.

The decay of the Soviet experiment should come as no surprise to us. Wherever the comparisons have been made between free and closed societies—West Germany and East Germany, Austria and Czechoslovakia, Malaysia and Vietnam—it is the democratic countries what are prosperous and responsive to the needs of their people. And one of the simple but overwhelming facts of our time is this: Of all the millions of refugees we've seen in the modern world, their flight is always away from, not toward the Communist world. Today on the NATO line, our military forces face east to prevent a possible invasion. On the other side of the line, the Soviet forces also face east to prevent their people from leaving.

The hard evidence of totalitarian rule has caused in mankind an uprising of the intellect and will. Whether it is the growth of the new schools of economics in America or England or the appearance of the so-called new philosophers in France, there is one unifying thread running through the intellectual work of these groups—rejection of the arbitrary power of the state, the refusal to subordinate the rights of the individual to the superstate, the realization that collectivism stifles all the best human impulses.

Since the exodus from Egypt, historians have written of those who sacrificed and struggled for freedom—the stand at Thermopylae, the revolt of Spartacus, the storming of the Bastille, the Warsaw uprising in World War II. More recently we've seen evidence of this same human impulse in one of the developing nations in Central America. For months and months the world news media covered the fighting in El Salvador. Day after day we were treated to stories and film slanted toward the brave freedom-fighters battling oppressive government forces in behalf of the silent, suffering people of that tortured country.

And then one day those silent, suffering people were offered a chance to vote, to choose the kind of government they wanted. Suddenly the freedom-fighters in the hills were exposed for what they really are—Cuban-backed guerrillas who want power for themselves, and their backers, not democracy for the people. They threatened death to any who voted, and destroyed hundreds of buses and trucks to keep the people from getting to the polling places. But on election day,⁵ the people of El Salvador, an unprecedented 1.4 million of them, braved ambush and gunfire, and trudged for miles to vote for freedom.

They stood for hours in the hot sun waiting for their turn to vote. Members of our Congress who went there as observers⁶ told me of a woman who was wounded by rifle fire on the way to the polls, who refused to leave the line to have her wound treated until after she had voted. A grandmother, who had been told by the guerrillas she would be killed when she returned from the polls, and she told the guerrillas, “You can kill me, you can kill my family, kill my neighbors, but you can’t kill us all.” The real freedom-fighters of El Salvador turned out to be the people of that country—the young, the old, the in-between.

Strange, but in my own country there’s been little if any news coverage of that war since the election. Now, perhaps they’ll say it’s—well, because there are newer struggles now.

On distant islands in the South Atlantic young men are fighting for Britain.⁷ And, yes, voices have been raised protesting their sacrifice for lumps of rock and earth so far away. But those young men aren’t fighting for mere real estate. They fight for a cause—for the belief that armed aggression must not be allowed to succeed, and the people must participate in the decisions of government—[applause]*—*the decisions of government under the rule of law. If there had been firmer support for that principle some 45 years ago, perhaps our generation wouldn’t have suffered the bloodletting of World War II.

In the Middle East now the guns sound once more, this time in Lebanon,⁸ a country that for too long has had to endure the tragedy of civil war, terrorism, and foreign intervention and occupation. The fighting in Lebanon on the part of all parties must stop, and Israel should bring its forces home. But this is not enough. We must all work to stamp out the scourge of terrorism that in the Middle East makes war an ever-present threat.

But beyond the troublespots lies a deeper, more positive pattern. Around the world today, the democratic revolution is gathering new strength. In India a critical test has been passed with the peaceful change of governing political parties. In Africa, Nigeria is moving into remarkable and unmistakable ways to build and strengthen its democratic institutions. In the Caribbean and Central America, 16 of 24 countries have freely elected governments. And in the United Nations, 8 of the 10 developing nations which have joined that body in the past 5 years are democracies.

In the Communist world as well, man's instinctive desire for freedom and self-determination surfaces again and again. To be sure, there are grim reminders of how brutally the police state attempts to snuff out this quest for self-rule—1953 in East Germany, 1956 in Hungary, 1968 in Czechoslovakia, 1981 in Poland. But the struggle continues in Poland. And we know that there are even those who strive and suffer for freedom within the confines of the Soviet Union itself. How we conduct ourselves here in the Western democracies will determine whether this trend continues.

No, democracy is not a fragile flower. Still it needs cultivating. If the rest of this century is to witness the gradual growth of freedom and democratic ideals, we must take actions to assist the campaign for democracy.

Some argue that we should encourage democratic change in right-wing dictatorships, but not in Communist regimes. Well, to accept this preposterous notion—as some well-meaning people have—is to invite the argument that once countries achieve a nuclear capability, they should be allowed an undisturbed reign of terror over their own citizens. We reject this course.

As for the Soviet view, Chairman Brezhnev repeatedly has stressed that the competition of ideas and system must continue and that this is entirely consistent with relaxation of tensions and peace.

Well, we ask only that these systems begin by living up to their own constitutions, abiding by their own laws, and complying with the international obligations they have undertaken. We ask only for a process, a direction, a basic code of decency, not for an instant transformation.

We cannot ignore the fact that even without our encouragement there has been and will continue to be repeated explosions against repression and dictatorships. The Soviet Union itself is not immune to this reality. Any system is inherently unstable that has no peaceful means to legitimize its leaders. In such cases, the very repressiveness of the state ultimately drives people to resist it, if necessary, by force.

While we must be cautious about forcing the pace of change, we must not hesitate to declare our ultimate objectives and to take concrete actions to move toward them. We must be staunch in our conviction that freedom is not the sole prerogative of a lucky few, but the inalienable and universal right of all human beings. So states the United Nations

Universal Declaration of Human Rights, which, among other things, guarantees free elections.⁹

The objective I propose is quite simple to state: to foster the infrastructure of democracy, the system of a free press, unions, political parties, universities, which allows a people to choose their own way to develop their own culture, to reconcile their own differences through peaceful means.

This is not cultural imperialism, it is providing the means for genuine self-determination and protection for diversity. Democracy already flourishes in counties with very different cultures and historical experiences. It would be cultural condescension, or worse, to say that any people prefer dictatorship to democracy. Who would voluntarily choose not to have the right to vote, decide to purchase government propaganda handouts instead of independent newspapers, prefer government to worker-controlled unions, opt for land to be owned by the state instead of those who till it, want government repression of religious liberty, a single political party instead of a free choice, a rigid cultural orthodoxy instead of democratic tolerance and diversity?

Since 1917 the Soviet Union has given covert political training and assistance to Marxist-Leninists in many countries. Of course, it also has promoted the use of violence and subversion by these same forces. Over the past several decades, West European and other Social Democrats, Christian Democrats, and leaders have offered open assistance to fraternal, political, and social institutions to bring about peaceful and democratic progress. Appropriately, for a vigorous new democracy, the Federal Republic of Germany's political foundations have become a major force in this effort.

We in America now intend to take additional steps, as many of our allies have already done, toward realizing this same goal. The chairmen and other leaders of the national Republican and Democratic Party organizations are initiating a study with the bipartisan American political foundation to determine how the United States can best contribute as a nation to the global campaign for democracy now gathering force. They will have the cooperation of congressional leaders of both parties, along with representatives of business, labor, and other major institutions in our society. I look forward to receiving their recommendations and to working with these institutions and the Congress in the common task of strengthening democracy throughout the world.

It is time that we committed ourselves as a nation—in both the public and private sectors—to assisting democratic development.

⁹ For the text of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, adopted by the UN General Assembly on December 10, 1948, see Department of State Bulletin, December 19, 1948, pp. 752–754.

We plan to consult with leaders of other nations as well. There is a proposal before the Council of Europe to invite parliamentarians from democratic countries to a meeting next year in Strasbourg. That prestigious gathering could consider ways to help democratic political movements.

This November in Washington there will take place an international meeting on free elections.¹⁰ And next spring there will be a conference of world authorities on constitutionalism and self-government hosted by the Chief Justice of the United States. Authorities from a number of developing and developed countries—judges, philosophers, and politicians with practical experience—have agreed to explore how to turn principle into practice and further the rule of law.

At the same time, we invite the Soviet Union to consider with us how the competition of ideas and values—which it is committed to support—can be conducted on a peaceful and reciprocal basis. For example, I am prepared to offer President Brezhnev an opportunity to speak to the American people on our television if he will allow me the same opportunity with the Soviet people. We also suggest that panels of our newsmen periodically appear on each other's television to discuss major events.

Now, I don't wish to sound overly optimistic, yet the Soviet Union is not immune from the reality of what is going on in the world. It has happened in the past—a small ruling elite either mistakenly attempts to ease domestic unrest through greater repression and foreign adventure, or it chooses a wiser course. It begins to allow its people a voice in their own destiny. Even if this latter process is not realized soon, I believe the renewed strength of the democratic movement, complemented by a global campaign for freedom, will strengthen the prospects for arms control and a world at peace.

I have discussed on other occasions, including my address on May 9th,¹¹ the elements of Western policies toward the Soviet Union to safeguard our interests and protect the peace. What I am describing now is a plan and a hope for the long term—the march of freedom and democracy which will leave Marxism-Leninism on the ash-heap of history as it has left other tyrannies which stifle the freedom and muzzle the self-expression of the people. And that's why we must continue our efforts to strengthen NATO even as we move forward with our Zero-Option initiative in the negotiations on intermediate-range forces and our proposal for a one-third reduction in strategic ballistic missile warheads.

Our military strength is a prerequisite to peace, but let it be clear we maintain this strength in the hope it will never be used, for the ultimate determinant in the struggle that's now going on in the world will not be bombs and rockets, but a test of wills and ideas, a trial of spiritual resolve, the values we hold, the beliefs we cherish, the ideals to which we are dedicated.

The British people know that, given strong leadership, time and a little bit of hope, the forces of good ultimately rally and triumph over evil. Here among you is the cradle of self-government, the Mother of Parliaments. Here is the enduring greatness of the British contribution to mankind, the great civilized ideas: individual liberty, representative government, and the rule of law under God.

I've often wondered about the shyness of some of us in the West about standing for these ideals that have done so much to ease the plight of man and the hardships of our imperfect world. This reluctance to use those vast resources at our command reminds me of the elderly lady whose home was bombed in the Blitz. As the rescuers moved about, they found a bottle of brandy she'd stored behind the staircase, which was all that was left standing. And since she was barely conscious, one of the workers pulled the cork to give her a taste of it. She came around immediately and said, "Here now—there now, put it back. That's for emergencies." [Laughter]

Well, the emergency is upon us. Let us be shy no longer. Let us go to our strength. Let us offer hope. Let us tell the world that a new age is not only possible but probable.

During the dark days of the Second World War, when this island was incandescent with courage, Winston Churchill exclaimed about Britain's adversaries, "What kind of a people do they think we are?" Well, Britain's adversaries found out what extraordinary people the British are. But all the democracies paid a terrible price for allowing the dictators to underestimate us. We dare not make that mistake again. So, let us ask ourselves, "What kind of people do we think we are?" And let us answer, "Free people, worthy of freedom and determined not only to remain so but to help others gain their freedom as well."

Sir Winston led his people to great victory in war and then lost an election just as the fruits of victory were about to be enjoyed. But he left office honorably, and, as it turned out, temporarily, knowing that the liberty of his people was more important than the fate of any single leader. History recalls his greatness in ways no dictator will ever know. And he left us a message of hope for the future, as timely now as when he first uttered it, as opposition leader in the Commons nearly 27 years ago, when he said, "When we look back on all the perils through which we have passed and at the mighty foes that we have laid low and all the dark and deadly designs that we have frustrated, why should we fear for our future? We have," he said, "come safely through the worst."

Well, the task I've set forth will long outlive our own generation. But together, we too have come through the worst. Let us now begin a major effort to secure the best—a crusade for freedom that will engage the faith and fortitude of the next generation. For the sake of peace and justice, let us move toward a world in which all people are at last free to determine their own destiny.

Thank you.

105. Memorandum From Secretary of Defense Weinberger to the President's Assistant for National Security Affairs (Clark)¹

Washington, June 9, 1982

SUBJECT

Prevention of Accidental Outbreak of War

If, as I suspect, it proves to be not possible to insert the proposal on prevention of accidental war into the President's Bonn speech,² I would suggest that the UN Special Session on Disarmament would offer a particularly good and appropriate time to make the point.³

Again, simply to summarize points I have previously made, there would be a strong element of a new, easily understood, basically simple proposal, about which there should be a very wide measure of agreement on all sides. Too, the President would thus certainly appear to have taken the initiative to develop a particular, constructive, and affirmative suggestion, whereas the rest of the meeting will be the usual bloodbath of rhetoric out of which very little is expected to emerge.

106. Address by President Reagan Before the United Nations General Assembly Special Session on Disarmament¹

New York, June 17, 1982

Remarks in New York City Before the United Nations General Assembly Special Session Devoted to Disarmament

Mr. Secretary-General, Mr. President,² distinguished delegates, ladies and gentlemen: I speak today as both a citizen of the United States and of the world. I come with the heartfelt wishes of my people for peace, bearing honest proposals and looking for genuine progress.

Dag Hammarskjöld said 24 years ago this month, “We meet in a time of peace, which is no peace.”³ His words are as true today as they were then. More than a hundred disputes have disturbed the peace among nations since World War II, and today the threat of nuclear disaster hangs over the lives of all our people. The Bible tells us there will be a time for peace, but so far this century mankind has failed to find it.

The United Nations is dedicated to world peace, and its charter clearly prohibits the international use of force. Yet the tide of belligerence continues to rise. The charter’s influence has weakened even in the 4 years since the first special session on disarmament.⁴ We must not only condemn aggression; we must enforce the dictates of our charter and resume the struggle for peace.

The record of history is clear: Citizens of the United States resort to force reluctantly and only when they must. Our foreign policy, as President Eisenhower once said, “is not difficult to state. We are for

In his personal diary entry for June 17, the President wrote: “This was a day in N.Y. This morning I addressed the U.N. General Assembly. Ambassador Gromyko did not applaud. I said some blunt things about the Soviet U. that needed saying. They were not well received by the large segment which usually votes against the U.S. & with the U.S.S.R. On the other hand, I think my talk added to the results of the trip to Europe & was a plus.” (Brinkley, ed., The Reagan Diaries, vol. I, January 1981–June 1985, p. 137) peace first, last, and always for very simple reasons."⁵ We know that only in a peaceful atmosphere, a peace with justice, one in which we can be confident, can America prosper as we have known prosperity in the past, he said.

He said to those who challenge the truth of those words, let me point out, at the end of World War II, we were the only undamaged industrial power in the world. Our military supremacy was unquestioned. We had harnessed the atom and had the ability to unleash its destructive force anywhere in the world. In short, we could have achieved world domination, but that was contrary to the character of our people. Instead, we wrote a new chapter in the history of mankind.

We used our power and wealth to rebuild the war-ravaged economies of the world, both East and West, including those nations who had been our enemies. We took the initiative in creating such international institutions as this United Nations, where leaders of good will could come together to build bridges for peace and prosperity.

America has no territorial ambitions. We occupy no countries, and we have built no walls to lock our people in. Our commitment to self-determination, freedom, and peace is the very soul of America. That commitment is as strong today as it ever was.

The United States has fought four wars in my lifetime. In each, we struggled to defend freedom and democracy. We were never the aggressors. America's strength and, yes, her military power have been a force for peace, not conquest; for democracy, not despotism; for freedom, not tyranny. Watching, as I have, succeeding generations of American youth bleed their lives onto far-flung battlefields to protect our ideals and secure the rule of law, I have known how important it is to deter conflict. But since coming to the Presidency, the enormity of the responsibility of this office has made my commitment even deeper. I believe that responsibility is shared by all of us here today.

On our recent trip to Europe,⁶ my wife, Nancy, told me of a bronze statue, 22 feet high, that she saw on a cliff on the coast of France. The beach at the base of the cliff is called Saint Laurent, but countless American family Bibles have written it in on the flyleaf and known it as Omaha Beach. The pastoral quiet of that French countryside is in marked contrast to the bloody violence that took place there on a June day 38 years ago when the Allies stormed the Continent.⁷ At the end of just one day of battle, 10,500 Americans were wounded, missing, or killed in what became known as the Normandy landing.

The statue atop that cliff is called “The Spirit of American Youth Rising From the Waves.” Its image of sacrifice is almost too powerful to describe.

The pain of war is still vivid in our national memory. It sends me to this special session of the United Nations eager to comply with the plea of Pope Paul VI when he spoke in this chamber nearly 17 years ago. “If you want to be brothers,” His Holiness said, “let the arms fall from your hands.”⁸ Well, we Americans yearn to let them go. But we need more than mere words, more than empty promises before we can proceed.

We look around the world and see rampant conflict and aggression. There are many sources of this conflict—expansionist ambitions, local rivalries, the striving to obtain justice and security. We must all work to resolve such discords by peaceful means and to prevent them from escalation.

In the nuclear era, the major powers bear a special responsibility to ease these sources of conflict and to refrain from aggression. And that’s why we’re so deeply concerned by Soviet conduct. Since World War II, the record of tyranny has included Soviet violation of the Yalta agreements leading to domination of Eastern Europe, symbolized by the Berlin Wall—a grim, gray monument to repression that I visited just a week ago. It includes the takeovers of Czechoslovakia, Hungary, and Afghanistan; and the ruthless repression of the proud people of Poland. Soviet-sponsored guerrillas and terrorists are at work in Central and South America, in Africa, the Middle East, in the Caribbean, and in Europe, violating human rights and unnerving the world with violence. Communist atrocities in Southeast Asia, Afghanistan, and elsewhere continue to shock the free world as refugees escape to tell of their horror.

The decade of so-called détente witnessed the most massive Soviet buildup of military power in history. They increased their defense spending by 40 percent while American defense actually declined in the same real terms. Soviet aggression and support for violence around the world have eroded the confidence needed for arms negotiations. While we exercised unilateral restraint, they forged ahead and today possess nuclear and conventional forces far in excess of an adequate deterrent capability.

Soviet oppression is not limited to the countries they invade. At the very time the Soviet Union is trying to manipulate the peace movement in the West, it is stifling a budding peace movement at home. In Moscow, banners are scuttled, buttons are snatched, and demonstrators are arrested when even a few people dare to speak about their fears.

Eleanor Roosevelt, one of our first ambassadors to this body, reminded us that the high-sounding words of tyrants stand in bleak contradiction to their deeds. "Their promises," she said, "are in deep contrast to their performances."

My country learned a bitter lesson in this century: The scourge of tyranny cannot be stopped with words alone. So, we have embarked on an effort to renew our strength that had fallen dangerously low. We refuse to become weaker while potential adversaries remain committed to their imperialist adventures.

My people have sent me here today to speak for them as citizens of the world, which they truly are, for we Americans are drawn from every nationality represented in this chamber today. We understand that men and women of every race and creed can and must work together for peace. We stand ready to take the next steps down the road of cooperation through verifiable arms reduction.

Agreements on arms control and disarmament can be useful in reinforcing peace; but they're not magic. We should not confuse the signing of agreements with the solving of problems. Simply collecting agreements will not bring peace. Agreements genuinely reinforce peace only when they are kept. Otherwise we're building a paper castle that will be blown away by the winds of war.

Let me repeat, we need deeds, not words, to convince us of Soviet sincerity, should they choose to join us on this path.

Since the end of World War II, the United States has been the leader in serious disarmament and arms control proposals. In 1946, in what became known as the Baruch plan, the United States submitted a proposal for control of nuclear weapons and nuclear energy by an international authority.⁹ The Soviets rejected this plan. In 1955 President Eisenhower made his "Open Skies" proposal, under which the United States and the Soviet Union would have exchanged blueprints of military establishments and provided for aerial reconnaissance.¹⁰ The Soviets rejected this plan.

¹⁰ Eisenhower outlined his "Open Skies" proposal during the Geneva Conference on July 21, 1955; see footnote 4, Document 95. For the text of his statement, see Public Papers: Eisenhower, 1955, pp. 713–716. See also Foreign Relations, 1955–1957, vol. V, Austrian State Treaty; Summit and Foreign Ministers Meetings, 1955, Document 221.

In 1963 the Limited Test Ban Treaty came into force.¹¹ This treaty ended nuclear weapons testing in the atmosphere, outer space, or under water by participating nations. In 1970 the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons took effect.¹² The United States played a major role in this key effort to prevent the spread of nuclear explosives and to provide for international safeguards on civil nuclear activities.

My country remains deeply committed to those objectives today, and to strengthening the nonproliferation framework. This is essential to international security. In the early 1970's, again at United States urging, agreements were reached between the United States and the U.S.S.R. providing for ceilings on some categories of weapons.¹³ They could have been more meaningful if Soviet actions had shown restraint and commitment to stability at lower levels of force.

The United Nations designated the 1970's as the First Disarmament Decade.¹⁴ But good intentions were not enough. In reality that 10-year period included an unprecedented buildup in military weapons and the flaring of aggression and use of force in almost every region of the world. We are now in the Second Disarmament Decade. The task at hand is to assure civilized behavior among nations, to unite behind an agenda of peace.

Over the past 7 months, the United States has put forward a broad-based, comprehensive series of proposals to reduce the risk of war. We have proposed four major points as an agenda for peace: elimination of land-based, intermediate-range missiles; a one-third reduction in strategic ballistic missile warheads; a substantial reduction in NATO and Warsaw Pact ground and air forces; and new safeguards to reduce the risk of accidental war.¹⁵ We urge the Soviet Union today to join with us in this quest. We must act not for ourselves alone, but for all mankind.

On November 18th of last year, I announced United States objectives in arms control agreements. They must be equitable and militarily significant. They must stabilize forces at lower levels, and they must be verifiable. The United States and its allies have made specific, reasonable, and equitable proposals.

¹¹ Initialed on July 25, 1963, and signed in Moscow on August 5. The Limited Test Ban Treaty (14 UST 1313) entered into force on October 10.

¹² The Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty was signed in Washington on July 1, 1968. Following ratification by the United States, United Kingdom, Soviet Union, and 40 other states, the treaty (21 UST 483) entered into force on March 5, 1970.

¹³ Presumable reference to SALT I. See footnote 4, Document 36.

¹⁵ See Document 105. The President discussed these proposed safeguards within the context of his June 11 Berlin speech; see footnote 7, Document 100, and footnote 3, Document 104.

In February, our negotiating team in Geneva offered the Soviet Union a draft treaty on intermediate-range nuclear forces.¹⁶ We offered to cancel deployment of our Pershing II ballistic missiles and ground-launched cruise missiles in exchange for Soviet elimination of the SS-20, SS-4, and SS-5 missiles. This proposal would eliminate with one stroke those systems about which both sides have expressed the greatest concern.

The United States is also looking forward to beginning negotiations on strategic arms reductions with the Soviet Union in less than 2 weeks. We will work hard to make these talks an opportunity for real progress in our quest for peace.

On May 9th I announced a phased approach to the reduction of strategic arms.¹⁷ In a first phase, the number of ballistic missile warheads on each side would be reduced to about 5,000. No more than half the remaining warheads would be on land-based missiles. All ballistic missiles would be reduced to an equal level, at about one-half the current United States number. In the second phase, we would reduce each side's overall destructive power to equal levels, including a mutual ceiling on ballistic missile throw-weight below the current U.S. level. We are also prepared to discuss other elements of the strategic balance.

Before I returned from Europe last week, I met in Bonn with the leaders of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. We agreed to introduce a major new Western initiative for the Vienna negotiations on Mutual Balanced Force Reductions.¹⁸ Our approach calls for common, collective ceilings for both NATO and the Warsaw Treaty Organization. After 7 years, there would be a total of 700,000 ground forces and 900,000 ground and air force personnel combined. It also includes a package of associated measures to encourage cooperation and verify compliance.

We urge the Soviet Union and members of the Warsaw Pact to view our Western proposal as a means to reach agreement in Vienna after 9 long years of inconclusive talks. We also urge them to implement the 1975 Helsinki agreement on security and cooperation in Europe.¹⁹

Let me stress that for agreements to work, both sides must be able to verify compliance. The building of mutual confidence in compliance can only be achieved through greater openness. I encourage the special session on disarmament to endorse the importance of these principles in arms control agreements. I have instructed our representatives at the 40-nation Committee on Disarmament to renew emphasis on verification and compliance. Based on a U.S. proposal, a committee has been formed to examine these issues as they relate to restrictions on nuclear testing.

We are also pressing the need for effective verification provisions in agreements banning chemical weapons. The use of chemical and biological weapons has long been viewed with revulsion by civilized nations. No peacemaking institution can ignore the use of those dread weapons and still live up to its mission. The need for a truly effective and verifiable chemical weapons agreement has been highlighted by recent events. The Soviet Union and their allies are violating the Geneva Protocol of 1925, related rules of international law, and the 1972 Biological Weapons Convention.²⁰ There is conclusive evidence that the Soviet Government has provided toxins for use in Laos and Kampuchea, and are themselves using chemical weapons against freedom-fighters in Afghanistan.²¹

We have repeatedly protested to the Soviet Government, as well as to the Governments of Laos and Vietnam, their use of chemical and toxin weapons. We call upon them now to grant full and free access to their countries or to territories they control so that United Nations experts can conduct an effective, independent investigation to verify cessation of these horrors.

Evidence of noncompliance with existing arms control agreements underscores the need to approach negotiation of any new agreements with care. The democracies of the West are open societies. Information on our defenses is available to our citizens, our elected officials, and the world. We do not hesitate to inform potential adversaries of our military forces and ask in return for the same information concerning theirs.

The amount and type of military spending by a country is important for the world to know, as a measure of its intentions and the threat that country may pose to its neighbors. The Soviet Union and other closed societies go to extraordinary lengths to hide their true military spending, not only from other nations but from their own people. This practice contributes to distrust and fear about their intentions.

Today, the United States proposes an international conference on military expenditures to build on the work of this body in developing a common system for accounting and reporting. We urge the Soviet Union, in particular, to join this effort in good faith, to revise the universally discredited official figures it publishes, and to join with us in giving the world a true account of the resources we allocate to our armed forces.

Last Friday in Berlin, I said that I would leave no stone unturned in the effort to reinforce peace and lessen the risk of war.²² It's been clear to me steps should be taken to improve mutual communication, confidence, and lessen the likelihood of misinterpretation. I have, therefore, directed the exploration of ways to increase understanding and communication between the United States and the Soviet Union in times of peace and of crisis.

We will approach the Soviet Union with proposals for reciprocal exchanges in such areas as advance notification of major strategic exercises that otherwise might be misinterpreted; advance notification of ICBM launches within, as well as beyond, national boundaries; and an expanded exchange of strategic forces data.

While substantial information on U.S. activities and forces in these areas already is provided, I believe that jointly and regularly sharing information would represent a qualitative improvement in the strategic nuclear environment and would help reduce the chance of misunderstandings. I call upon the Soviet Union to join the United States in exploring these possibilities to build confidence, and I ask for your support of our efforts.

One of the major items before this conference is the development of a comprehensive program of disarmament. We support the effort to chart a course of realistic and effective measures in the quest for peace.

I have come to this hall to call for international recommitment to the basic tenet of the United Nations Charter—that all members practice tolerance and live together in peace as good neighbors under the rule of law, forsaking armed force as a means of settling disputes between nations. America urges you to support the agenda for peace that I have outlined today. We ask you to reinforce the bilateral and multilateral arms control negotiations between members of NATO and the Warsaw Pact and to rededicate yourselves to maintaining international peace and security, and removing threats to peace.

We, who have signed the U.N. Charter, have pledged to refrain from the threat or use of force against the territory or independence of any state. In these times when more and more lawless acts are going unpunished—as some members of this very body show a growing disregard for the U.N. Charter—the peace-loving nations of the world must condemn aggression and pledge again to act in a way that is worthy of the ideals that we have endorsed. Let us finally make the charter live.

In late spring, 37 years ago, representatives of 50 nations gathered on the other side of this continent, in the San Francisco Opera House. The League of Nations had crumbled, and World War II still raged. But those men and nations were determined to find peace. The result was this charter for peace that is the framework of the United Nations.

President Harry Truman spoke of the revival of an old faith.²³ He said the everlasting moral force of justice prompting that United Nations Conference—such a force remains strong in America and in other countries where speech is free and citizens have the right to gather and make their opinions known. And President Truman said, “If we should pay merely lip service to inspiring ideals, and later do violence to simple justice, we would draw down upon us the bitter wrath of generations yet unborn.” Those words of Harry Truman have special meaning for us today as we live with the potential to destroy civilization.

“We must learn to live together in peace,” he said. “We must build a new world—a far better world.” What a better world it would be if the guns were silent, if neighbor no longer encroached on neighbor, and all peoples were free to reap the rewards of their toil and determine their own destiny and system of government, whatever their choice.

During my recent audience with His Holiness Pope John Paul II, I gave him the pledge of the American people to do everything possible for peace and arms reduction.²⁴ The American people believe forging real and lasting peace to be their sacred trust. Let us never forget that such a peace would be a terrible hoax if the world were no longer blessed with freedom and respect for human rights.

“The United Nations,” Hammarskjöld said, “was born out of the cataclysms of war. It should justify the sacrifices of all those who have died for freedom and justice. It is our duty to the past.” Hammarskjöld said, “And it is our duty to the future so to serve both our nations and the world.”

As both patriots of our nations and the hope of all the world, let those of us assembled here in the name of peace deepen our understandings, renew our commitment to the rule of law, and take new and bolder steps to calm an uneasy world. Can any delegate here deny that in so doing he would be doing what the people, the rank and file of his own country or her own country want him or her to do? Isn't it time for us to really represent the deepest most heartfelt yearnings of all of our people?

Let no nation abuse this common longing to be free of fear. We must not manipulate our people by playing upon their nightmares. We must serve mankind through genuine disarmament. With God's help we can secure life and freedom for generations to come.

Thank you very much.

107. Editorial Note

On June 25, 1982, President Ronald Reagan announced the resignation of Secretary of State Alexander Haig in remarks made to reporters at 3:04 p.m. in the Briefing Room at the White House. Indicating that he would not entertain any questions, Reagan stated: "It's an announcement that I make with great regret regarding a member of our administration who has served this country for 40 years, above and beyond the call of duty; who has served me so well and faithfully; whose wisdom and counsel I have respected and admired for all the time that our administration has been here, but who now is resigning and leaving government service after all this great time."

The President then indicated that he intended to nominate George Shultz as Secretary. (Public Papers: Reagan, 1982, Book I, page 819). Reagan's letter accepting Haig's resignation and Haig's resignation letter, both dated June 25, are ibid., pages 819–820. For Haig's recollections concerning his decision to resign and his last days as Secretary of State, see Caveat, pages 346–352.

At his June 30 news conference, the President answered questions regarding the Haig resignation, despite his stated desire to provide no further comments. In response to a question regarding whether there would "be any changes or if anything will be done differently, so that the sort of problems that led to his resignation won't reoccur," Reagan asserted: "There's going to be no change in policy. Foreign policy comes from the Oval Office and with the help of a fine Secretary of State. And I've had that fine Secretary of State. And I must say, fortunately for the country, for the administration, as Secretary Haig leaves, his replacement is a man with great experience and a man of unquestioned integrity, and I think we're all fortunate that we have been able to have such a replacement.

"My system has been one—and always has been one—not of having a synthesis presented to me of where there are conflicting ideas and then it's boiled down and I get a single option to approve or disapprove. I prefer debate and discussion, a debate all those who have an interest in a certain issue and a reason for that interest, to have their say, not be—sit around as 'yes' men. And then I make my decision, based on what I have heard in that discussion. And that will be the procedure we'll follow." (Public Papers: Reagan, 1982, Book I, page 828)

108. Memorandum From Paula Dobriansky of the National Security Council Staff to the President's Deputy Assistant for National Security Affairs (McFarlane)¹

Washington, July 9, 1982

SUBJECT

Shultz Briefing

Per your request, below are several points reflective of the President's foreign policy perspective:

—The President is committed to the pursuit of a consistent and coherent foreign policy which safeguards America's national security interests and upholds our essential democratic values. This policy is implemented in close coordination and consultation with our Allies.

—East/West: The President approaches our relations with the Soviet Union as a realist. He has no illusions about the fundamental and implacable nature of conflict between the U.S and the USSR. He is firmly convinced that given the inadequacies and inefficiencies endemic to the Soviet system, the non-communist mode of development would eventually prevail. At the same time, the President is convinced that we can and should negotiate with the Soviets in order to limit the risk of nuclear war, reduce the danger of crisis escalation and attempt to build on those limited areas of agreement which exist between our two countries. It is precisely in this spirit that the U.S has embarked on INF and START negotiations.

—Allied Relations: The President attaches great importance to the preservation and strengthening of intra-alliance ties. He is convinced that the U.S. along with the nations of Western Europe and other democratic allies has a special responsibility for the preservation of peace. Our common cultural values and democratic traditions provide a foundation upon which we base our respective foreign policies. The President is cognizant that disagreements on particular issues do exist—in fact, it can hardly be otherwise given the democratic and pluralistic nature of our societies. However, he believes that the existing differences do not detract from the viability of the Western alliance and can be resolved from mutual consultation conducted in a fair and equitable fashion. 109. Editorial Note

On July 13 and 14, 1982, George Shultz testified before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in support of his nomination as Secretary of State. In his July 13 opening remarks, Shultz highlighted his professional background, including his government service during previous administrations, including his tenure as Secretary of Labor, Director of the Office of Management and Budget, and Secretary of the Treasury, before describing some of the current realities of U.S. foreign policy: “Today most Americans recognize that the nature and strength of our diplomacy and our strategic posture are linked to and heavily dependent on our performance at home. Our economy, despite current rough water, is fundamentally strong and will strengthen further as economic policies now in place and in prospect take hold. A strong and productive America makes us a strong trading partner and a resourceful ally, giving to our friends a confidence that strengthens their will to resist those who would deprive us of our freedoms.

“Today most Americans are uncomfortable with the fact that we spend so much of our substance on defense, and rightly so, and yet most Americans also recognize that we must deal with reality as we find it, and that reality in its simplest terms is an uncertain world in which peace and security can be assured only if we have the strength and will to preserve them.

“We have passed through a decade during which the Soviet Union expanded its military capability at a steady and rapid rate while we stood still. President Reagan has given us the leadership to turn that situation around, and just in time.

“The past decade taught us once again an important lesson about United States-Soviet relations. In brief, it is that diminished American strength and resolve are an open invitation for Soviet expansion into areas of critical interest to the West and provide no incentive for moderation in the Soviet military buildup. Thus it is critical to the overall success of our foreign policy that we persevere in the restoration of our strength; but it is also true that the willingness to negotiate from that strength is a fundamental element of strength itself.

The President has put forward arms control proposals in the strategic theater and conventional arms areas that are genuinely bold and that will, if accepted, reduce the burdens and the dangers of armaments. Let no one doubt the seriousness of our purpose, but let no one believe that we will seek agreement for its own sake without a balanced and constructive outcome.

“We recognize that an approach to the Soviet Union limited to the military dimension will not satisfy the American people. Our efforts in the area of arms reduction are inevitably linked to restraint in many dimensions of Soviet behavior, and as we enter a potentially critical period of transition in Soviet leadership, we must also make it clear that we are prepared to establish mutually beneficial and safer relationships on the basis of reciprocity.

“Today most Americans recognize that a steady and coherent involvement by the United States in the affairs of the world is a necessary condition for peace and prosperity. Over and over again since the close of the World War, the United States has been the global power to whom others have turned for help, whether it be to assist in the process of economic development or in finding peaceful solutions to conflict.”

After highlighting the Caribbean Basin Initiative as emblematic of this assistance, Shultz asserted: “In our international endeavors we are strengthened by a structure of alliances that is of central importance. Ours is not a hegemonic world but a diverse and pluralistic one, reflecting the complexity of the free, independent, and democratic societies with which we are associated.

“Just as we expect others to work in partnership with us, so we must conduct ourselves as a responsible partner. Frictions and differences are inevitable among allies, and we can never assume complacently that they will automatically disappear. Tolerance of the needs and perspectives of others. So is candid recognition of our difficulties and challenges.

“Above all, there has to be a commitment to the common values and interests on which the truly unique multilateral institutions of the last three and a half decades have been based. Our commitment is firm, as President Reagan made clear during his recent European trip. I am confident that the same is true of our allies.

“Mr. Chairman, if we are strong, we buttress our allies and friends and leave our adversaries in no doubt about the consequences of aggression. If we provide assistance to help others to be strong, our own strength can be husbanded and brought to bear more effectively. If we are confident, we give confidence to those who seek to resolve disputes peacefully. If we are engaged, we give hope to those who otherwise would have no hope. If we live by our ideals, we can argue their merit to others with confidence and conviction.” (Nomination of George P. Shultz: Hearings Before the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, Ninety-Seventh Congress, Second Session on Nomination of George P. Shultz, of California, to be Secretary of State, July 13 and 14, 1982, pages 6–12)

The Senate unanimously confirmed Shultz on July 15. 110. Information Memorandum From the Director of the Policy Planning Staff (Wolfowitz) to Secretary of State Shultz¹

Washington, July 24, 1982

SUBJECT

Possible Topics for Your UNGA Speech

We have been asked to give you quickly some possible topics for your speech to the United Nations General Assembly in September. We are told that you do not want to give a global overview which touches all issues briefly. Recognizing that this will probably be your first major address, IO believes you should emphasize your foreign policy, rather than multilateral issues or UN contributions. Naturally, given the forum, the speech must still be of broad international interest and contain some references to our support for the UN and to principles of the Charter. IO believes you could also refer to our intention to strengthen U.S. participation in international organizations.

You will, of course, be speaking to many audiences, not just the one you directly address. These audiences will include particularly domestic commentators, as well as allies and foreign governments. Venue will be a factor in their perceptions of what you say. For example, the UN venue might be an appropriate platform for a speech that addresses the concerns raised by our domestic nuclear debate.

Keeping these factors in mind, we circulated a memo requesting ideas from the various bureaus.² This memorandum incorporates suggestions we received, as well as some from our office.

In pondering possible topics or combinations of topics, it may help you to consider what past secretaries have done. As you know, the President or the Secretary of State addresses UNGA almost every year. We have reviewed a number of these and have summarized four by past secretaries which are fairly representative of the broad scope typical of these past addresses.

A QUICK LOOK AT SOME PAST UNGA SPEECHES BY PREVIOUS SECRETARIES

Last year, Secretary Haig spoke on international economic development.³ He identified five principles for a strategy of growth: open trading; foreign assistance coupled with sound domestic policy; regional cooperation; incentives for individual performance; and an atmosphere of peace and security. He urged a global expansion of trade, an increase in investment, international cooperation on food and energy.

In 1980, Secretary Muskie spoke on three aspects of peace: refraining from aggression (Afghanistan, Kampuchea); settling disputes peacefully (Zimbabwe, Namibia, Iranian hostage crisis); and arms control.⁴

In 1978, Secretary Vance covered economic progress (cooperation on North-South issues, open trade, strengthening commodity markets), managing global resources (food, energy, law of the sea), and the enhancement of human dignity (through political and economic human rights, ending torture, aiding refugees, pursuing peace in troubled areas, and arms control).⁵

³ September 21, 1981. See Document 63.

⁴ Muskie's September 22, 1980, address is printed in Department of State Bulletin, November 1980, pp. 57–60.

In 1973, Henry Kissinger reviewed some of the progress since the UN began, asked the world to move from detente to cooperation, and noted U.S. efforts for peace around the world, the problem of shrinking world resources, and areas for world cooperation (curbing conflict, feeding the hungry, aiding development).⁶

SOME POSSIBLE TOPICS

We have four conventional suggestions, and two slightly more controversial topics. Any one of these topics could form the basis for a speech, or, if you wish to cover more ground, the topics might be combined quite easily.

1. Arms Control, Emphasizing Non-Proliferation

You might echo the comprehensive arms control themes of the President's June 17 SSOD II address.⁷ PM notes that you could add emphasis on CBW arms control, and possible violations to build support for an international meeting on CBW and to reinforce our concern for verification in all arms control agreements.

This portion of the speech could serve an important role in countering the nuclear freeze moment, an issue that will be much debated in the approaching fall elections. Referenda on the freeze will be on at least 5 and possibly 15 ballots. In addition, we can expect candidates for office, including Jerry Brown, to make it an issue.

Having reviewed the central elements of our arms control policy, you could then focus the bulk of your remarks on the subject of non-proliferation. Despite high public interest, as evidenced during your confirmation hearings,⁸ there has been little public discussion of the proliferation problem by senior officials of the Reagan Administration. The result has been not only growing Congressional criticism, but also tentative new efforts on the part of suppliers to cross thresholds once considered taboo. Our new policy depends heavily on quiet cooperation among major suppliers in restricting sensitive technologies from volatile regions of the world. However, we agree with OES that there is a difference between being quiet about our specific efforts, and being quiet about the fundamental problem of proliferation itself.

Your speech would subtly remind the Europeans that proliferation is a nuclear arms control problem for which they themselves continue to bear important responsibilities. By showing the great destructive potential and instability which nuclear weapons would bring to already vulnerable regions of the world, your speech could also help refute the developing countries' rhetorical argument that non-proliferation simply preserves the special interests of the superpowers. Such a speech could also help to recover some of the ground lost by recent publicity on our test ban treaties.

2. Economic Issues

Given your background, economic development and international economic policy would be a natural topic.⁹ However, as noted above, it was the topic of Secretary Haig's UNGA address last year, and was covered in President Reagan's Philadelphia speech just prior to the Cancun Summit. We would have to deal with several areas where the audience might criticize U.S. performance, including our failure to accept the Law of the Sea Treaty,¹⁰ our sugar import restrictions,¹¹ steel, high interest rates, and the stalled Caribbean Basin Initiative.¹² In addition, we ⁹ Shultz earned a Ph.D. in economics from MIT and taught at both MIT and the University of Chicago. He served as Director of the Office of Management and Budget from 1970 until 1972 and Secretary of the Treasury from 1972 until 1974.

¹⁰ On April 30, the Third United Nations Conference on the Law of the Sea approved the Law of the Sea Treaty. The United States did not vote in favor of the treaty. In a July 9 statement, the President announced "that the United States will not sign the convention as adopted by the conference, and our participation in the remaining conference process will be at the technical level and will involve only those provisions that serve United States interests." (Public Papers: Reagan, 1982, Book II, p. 911) Documentation is in Foreign Relations, 1981–1988, vol. XLI, Global Issues II, Documents 114–202.

¹² On July 15, the House Foreign Affairs Committee approved by voice vote the $350 million in economic aid the President had requested as a component of the CBI (see footnote 3, Document 97); however, the House added restrictions on the use of funds. On September 10, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee reported its authorization bill, including $350 million for CBI. Neither the House nor Senate authorization bills made it to the floor; however, CBI funding was included in H.R. 6863, the omnibus FY 1982 supplemental funding bill. The President vetoed the legislation in August, but Congress overrode the veto on September 10. (Congress and the Nation, vol. VI, 1981–1984, pp. 149) would have to face the question of whether we have made any progress since last year.

Nonetheless, there are real dangers to raise. Prolonged recession has raised pressures for protectionism, sapped enthusiasm for long-haul development, and accentuated debt and credit problems.

We have a very good position on the goals of economic efficiency and individual freedom, which can only be produced by a free market approach. You could convey that confrontation over ideological issues is sterile and that the UN should concentrate on stimulating growth by building on the strengths of the system we have. The speech would emphasize free market themes raised by the President and Secretary Haig last year. EB suggests you note the opportunity to expand the framework for trade offered by the forthcoming GATT Ministerial and to encourage development of LDC's hydrocarbon and alternative energy resources through private investment. In addition, U.S. programs of economic assistance, investment, trade, aid to international banks and organizations, and limited regulation are sound grounds to boast and contrast favorably to Soviet inaction and inability.

3. Agenda for Regional Peace

Regional disputes raise the gravest risk of confrontation between the superpowers, pose a dangerous context for proliferation, cause great suffering, and have created a worldwide problem of refugees. The U.S. is the party to which the world turns to resolve such crises and is currently involved in several efforts to resolve regional disputes. Thirty years ago, your speech might note, a regional dispute on the Korean peninsula brought UN troops into action and created a dangerous confrontation.

The Middle East may be very much on everyone's mind at the time of the speech and would be a main focus of a speech on this topic, provided the subject is not too hot. You would also want to mention U.S. and international efforts to resolve problems in Namibia, Afghanistan, Kampuchea, and possibly the Falklands. Poland, a slightly different case, might be raised, as might our concern for violent movements in North Africa and the Caribbean.

The UN Charter emphasizes the duty of peaceful settlement of disputes. L notes that our submission of the Gulf of Maine boundary dispute to the International Court of Justice¹³ and the creation of ¹³ Reference is to the Treaty Between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of Canada to Submit to Binding Dispute Settlement the Delimitation of the Maritime Boundary in the Gulf of Maine Area. United States and Canadian officials signed the treaty in Washington on March 29, 1979; it entered into force on November 20, 1981.

the U.S.-Iranian claims tribunal are concrete steps in furtherance of this duty.¹⁴

4. The Human Side of our Agenda to Peace

P raises the possibility that you cover a number of traditional issues, including those touched on above, under the general theme that human tragedies lie behind the headlines of world affairs. This would allow you to show some familiarity with a number of issues while reflecting our strong dedication to peace, individual liberty and humanitarian concerns.

This theme would permit a discussion of the refugee problem. Two issues relating to refugees will be before the UN this session: the renewal of the mandate of the High Commission for Refugees and the election of a new High Commissioner.¹⁵ Your speech could recognize the great contributions of the U.S. in this field, highlight major problem areas and frame the prime issues for UN attention. In addition, if our policy review recommends ratification of the Genocide Convention, this could be announced.¹⁶

SOME SLIGHTLY MORE CONTROVERSIAL TOPICS

The four suggestions above are all relatively safe topics. While this is not the occasion for very controversial issues, you might want to consider being a little more contentious with the following themes (that overlap to some extent the topics listed above).

5. Preserving Nuclear Peace

This speech would have the same purpose as topic No. 1 above, to address concerns about nuclear war, but it would specifically try to educate people to the fact that preventing nuclear war involves far more than just arms control. In this respect it would at least combine topics 1 and 3 (resolving regional disputes) above. I believe it should also to some degree point to the trend toward the use of force by the Soviet Union and its proxies as the greatest threat to peace, although how far to go along these lines must be weighed carefully.

¹⁴ The 1981 Algiers Accords established the Iran-U.S. Claims Tribunal, which met in The Hague for the first time in May 1981.

¹⁵ A/RES/37/196, adopted by the UN General Assembly on December 18, maintained the Office of the UN High Commissioner for Refugees for 5 years from January 1, 1984. Former Danish Prime Minister Poul Hartling, who had served as High Commissioner since 1978, was reelected by the General Assembly on December 18 for a 3-year term beginning January 1, 1983. (Yearbook of the United Nations: 1982, pp. 1195, 1626)

¹⁶ Reference is to the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide, adopted by the UN General Assembly on December 9, 1948 (A/RES/260(III)A).

A month ago I gave a speech along these general lines, which I have attached.¹⁷ Given at the Naval War College, the speech was very different in tone and content from what would be right for the UN. Nonetheless, it will give you a fuller notion of the way that I think regional peace should be tied to nuclear issues.

6. The Democratic Revolution

In his London speech, the President returned democracy to the political offensive by emphasizing the ideals of human freedom and by promoting democracy as the surest route to reaching those ideals.¹⁸ The President argued that democracy is the wave of the future. You might take up that call, perhaps tying the argument to concepts in the UN Charter. Such a speech might even be tied to the more traditional concerns about economic development by explicitly raising the issue of the ends that development is meant to serve.

Unavoidably, such a speech will raise (if only implicitly) the failure of most UN members to live up to the ideals of the Charter, and the active opposition of the Soviet Union and its allies to those ideals. The tone would have to be carefully modulated.

The speech should distinguish between areas of legitimate political differences and areas of human freedom not honestly at issue. For example, a choice of a free market economy as opposed to government ownership of certain industries might be noted as an honest difference that does not impinge on basic freedoms. You might note your preference for the efficiency and equity that can come from less regulation, but note also that neither side of this argument (which, after all, divides us from most UN member nations) falls outside the realm of acceptable moral behavior. On the other hand, suppression of free speech, free association, or a free press, or the use of torture and terrorism, for example, do violate fundamental notions of human dignity. Alternatives that extinguish all hope of political freedom deserve special condemnation.

Recommendation

The most important consideration in choosing a speech theme is that it provide a vehicle for presenting your thoughts and projecting the image that you are most comfortable with, so I offer my personal

¹⁷ Attached but not printed is Wolfowitz's June 22 address, which is printed as Department of State Current Policy No. 406. In it, Wolfowitz stated: "The prospects for preventing nuclear war depend on far more than just what we do about nuclear weapons themselves. They depend also on what we do to reduce the many local sources of conflict in the world and on what we do to promote possibilities of peaceful change. And they depend on what we do to restrain the Soviet use of force to exploit these sources of conflict."

opinions with some hesitation. That said, my own belief is that it is better to present some sharp edges than to stick to bland themes with which no one can disagree—but which likewise not draw any strong agreement either. (This is not a recommendation for confrontational rhetoric. Precisely if one speaks clearly about areas of disagreement, one should do so in firm but moderate and non-provocative language.)

Accordingly, I would recommend either topics 5 or 6. Were it not for the urgency of addressing our own domestic nuclear debate, I would prefer the Democratic Revolution theme. However, given our impending elections and referenda, I think it would be best to address the nuclear issue at this time.

A Further Thought on the Middle East

It might be tempting on this occasion to say something new and important on the Middle East. Such thoughts could easily fit under the Agenda for Regional Peace topic, and perhaps others. However, if you break any significant new ground on the Middle East, that will become the dominant theme of all the headline writers, obscuring any other message you might want to get across and creating the impression that you are a one-issue Secretary.

If you deem these risks worth running, you could do something useful and important for our Middle East policy by clearly criticizing both sides—the Israelis for settlements, removal of Mayors and other annexationist policies; the Arabs for their basic refusal to accept Israel's existence and for the consistent maximalism that has in the past rejected almost all attainable progress (starting with the Arab rejection of the UN's own partition plan in 1947). By using the device of balanced criticism of both sides, you could make harsher comments than we have previously made in official statements. Such a course would run the risks—but also bring the benefits—of having the extremists of both sides angry at you. It would express our determination to press both sides hard for real progress, and thus embolden moderates in both camps. (You should not, however, appear to be exclusively or mainly criticizing Israel, and thus implicitly apologizing for the U.S.; to do so risks encouraging an Arab belief that the tide is finally turning and that they can hold out for maximalist goals.)

Possible Topics for Your UNGA Speech²

I would like to see your speech start with a hymn to the human spirit, rising to a crescendo about the great things humanity has achieved, is achieving, and will yet achieve—if (and here the crescendo diminishes and becomes somber) we are successful in overcoming certain threats.

The hymn to the human spirit could touch on moral values that are common to all religions and most cultures; on achievements in art, music, literature, understanding of nature, and man; on expanding opportunities for leisure, education, travel, sports, recreation; on the broad dissemination of cultural activities and enlightenment through radio, television, movies; printing (and literacy), airplanes, telephones. In short, we have before us possibilities for a finer life, more widely shared, than humanity has ever dreamed of.

You need a philosopher to prepare the libretto and a poet to prepare the score of that hymn; and a meticulous editor to keep it from sounding evangelical or fatuous and to keep underdeveloped countries in focus. But get people's eyes off their feet and the rocks and show them the view from the top of the mountain.

Then shift to the more somber side. What hazards lie in our way, and how can we cope with them? Bring in the nitty-gritty issues that the Wolfowitz memo enumerates.³ But bring them up in the context of grand, noble, and inspiring possibilities that make it desperately necessary to tackle them and will make success infinitely rewarding.

Marvelous things are truly within reach for all humanity if we can achieve peace and international cooperation. But those cannot be attained by love and lofty thoughts alone. Indeed, a basic requirement is a world order in which people can cooperate without loving one another or sharing the same lofty thoughts. Such a world order requires sustained hard work on messy problems and details. But we must do it, we can do it—indeed, we are on the way.

I do not suggest skipping the mundane points in the Wolfowitz memo—quite the contrary. But package them with the perspective of wonderful things in reach if we succeed, not the perspective of horrors if we fail—though those horrors should be recognized to contrast with the rewards for success.

One of the hazards confronting us is overeagerness to attain the ultimate immediately. A country that promises its people goodies before those goodies can be produced risks economic chaos that may prevent the goodies ever being available and that may disrupt international trade to that country's own detriment. A healthy world economy is essential to a healthy world order, but simple formulas for economic health are hazardous.

Similarly, simple formulas for preventing nuclear war are hazardous.

More generally, the wonders that are in sight did not come about instantly or easily, and neither will control of the hazards. The wonders are the joint product of all the cultures of the world, and so will be control of the hazards.

112. Memorandum From the Representative to the United Nations (Kirkpatrick) to Secretary of State Shultz¹

New York, August 6, 1982

I have given a good deal of thought to your U.N.G.A. speech. As you know, the speech will have a world-wide audience. No speech you make as Secretary of State is likely to receive more press attention.

The U.N. is above all an institution of and for the so-called Third World. Their perspectives dominate its agenda as thoroughly as those nations dominate the membership. Furthermore, U.N. affairs get the most coverage in their countries. Therefore, it is important to speak to them with sympathy and understanding. Nothing else is quite “right” for the U.N.

I have already suggested the audience will think best of a speech that is long (at least 25 minutes long), broad in focus, constructive, even optimistic in tone.

I suggest you consider a speech that is somewhat “visionary;” perhaps a kind of modified utopia that describes some aspect of the international system (economic and/or political) you intend to work toward, then perhaps consider how you get there from here, including principle obstacles and how to overcome them.

As a methodological technique, postulating and delineating “preferred futures” guarantees clarity about goals and the relevance of policies to goals. As a dramatic technique it emphasizes and accentuates the positive.

Personally, I like the 1973 Kissinger speech.² His focus on curbing conflict, feeding the hungry and aiding development is perfect U.N. fare. I also like the idea of continuing the President’s theme of a democratic revolution as the wave of the future.

A focus on freedom would give you the opportunity to speak about both economic and politics; discussing the undoubted facts that freedom stimulates innovation, industry and economic development, political participation, loyalty and stability; that is, higher standards of living, higher levels of citizenship, a higher quality of life.

I agree with Paul, it is important above all that the speech express you: views, visions and values.

I will be happy to help anyway you like—on this as on all matters. Call on me.

UNGA Speech

Attached (TAB 1) is a first draft of a possible UNGA speech.² At this stage we have kept headings and some aspects of an outline format to make it clearer what particular sections are designed to do.

Based on Allen Wallis's comments (TAB 2)³ on the outline we sent you earlier, we have changed the structure of the speech substantially. It still addresses the nuclear issue—including nonproliferation—at length. But in addition to reacting, as Wallis puts it, to the agenda set by others, it also talks about our agenda—the promotion of political and economic freedom—and explains how the advance of freedom and democracy helps to promote the cause of peace.

The basic structure is:

—Man has great potential prospects; but also great dangers threaten all that has been or might be accomplished;

—The importance of efforts to control nuclear weapons: what the United States is doing to that end; also what we are doing to prevent nuclear proliferation and why we think that serves the interests of everyone;

—But we must do more than just limit weapons. We must:

- strengthen barriers to aggression;
- work to resolve regional conflicts;
- and, perhaps most important;

—We must work to channel man's energies away from war

—economic freedom, which not only spurs development and benefits the international trading system, but enhances political freedom;

—promoting democracy and political freedom, which enhance the chances for international peace.

—THE BASIC MESSAGE: The cause of freedom is the cause of peace.

We will begin working immediately on improving the present draft, but it would be helpful to have your guidance as soon as possible. Specific ideas or comments about the development of the themes would of course be useful (and we are getting some useful comments through Allen Wallis on specifics of presentation), but the most important thing to know at this stage is whether the general themes are on target, whether you are comfortable with a speech as broad and philosophical as this one, etc.

114. Note From the Director of the Policy Planning Staff (Wolfowitz) to Secretary of State Shultz¹

Washington, August 27, 1982

Mr. Secretary:

We received some very general guidance from S/S that you wanted a paper on U.S. strategy for the Pacific. We have tried earlier to develop an overall strategy just for East Asia. Even here, where our Asia expert is not burdened with the concentration on a particular bilateral relationship, that effort foundered on the difficulty of looking at Asian policy as anything more than a series of bilateral, or at most sub-regional, policies. There is a real question whether it makes sense to look at Asia any other way, given among other things, the deep differences that divide the region, the possible tensions between such an effort and smaller regional groupings (such as ASEAN) that we are seeking to encourage, and the advantages to the U.S. of dealing with individual countries bilaterally rather than en bloc.

The attached paper does not actually present a strategy for the Pacific, with all of the necessary country detail. Nor does it present a plan for a Pacific-wide institution (another subject that S/S thought you might be interested in). Rather, it addresses the issue of whether either of these enterprises is worth pursuing further.

My own feeling is that it does make sense to look at the region as a whole, despite the arguments mentioned above and the unquestioned need to pay primary attention to our rich and varied bilateral relationships. We already have to do so in developing our military strategy. That is paradoxical since the security issue is one subject on which it would be pointless to try to organize a Pacific community. Nevertheless, the U.S. military role underpins the stability that is essential if the remarkable dynamism of the region is to continue. Broadening our strategy to include a political and economic dimension could:

- 1) help to secure and strengthen our basic security role;
- 2) expand our participation in the economic growth of the region;
- 3) provide a useful complement to our European policy (and perhaps a bit of a nudge to the Europeans); and, finally,
- 4) if skillfully managed, might help to overcome some of the sense in this country that our involvement in foreign affairs is increasingly nothing more than a formula for taking on the burden of other people's problems.

Those are my hunches, but before proceeding further I would like to get some more precise guidance from you—and from others in the Department—about where we should be heading. Hopefully, the attached paper can be a useful vehicle for that discussion.

US Posture Toward the Pacific Basin

Introduction

In an article entitled "Illusions of Distance,"⁴ Albert Wohlstetter once cautioned against "mechanical regionalism:"

". . . Some (economic) unions might represent a gain; some surely would be a loss, particularly if their composition were determined solely on the basis of criteria as unrelated to economic efficiency as contiguity. They may be mainly rival exporters of the same commodities. . . . Neighborhood in international relations, as Jacob Viner has pointed out, has never guaranteed neighborly feelings, and often has prevented them. . . . Indeed, one of the largest defects of regionalism in the postwar period has been a frequent neglect of the hard truths of differences in political interest inside regions and the varying bonds of interests with countries outside. Regionalism, which has seemed a half-way house between nationalism and a utopian universalism, has itself sometimes been a kind of utopia for hard-headed Realpolitikers. . ."

Despite those cautions—but with them in mind—it is worth considering whether U.S. interests in the Pacific might in some way be usefully served by considering the region as a whole and developing a strategy for it. As a basis for such a consideration, this paper considers: (1) what are US interests in the Pacific region; (2) whether, and in what respects, it is useful to look at the Pacific region as a whole; and (3) whether the Pacific should receive increased emphasis in our overall strategy and if so whether that is best done through existing bilateral relationships or whether some broader organizational arrangement would be useful.

I. The US in the Pacific(A) Dynamism of the Pacific Region

—The Pacific Basin is an area of remarkable economic growth and dynamism. This is based in part on the region's wealth of human and natural resources. It is also based on successful Asian adaptations of some of our most fundamental economic and political principles. This makes the Pacific region a showcase for key American values.

—In recent years the Pacific area has witnessed the emergence of: ASEAN; economic dynamism among the NICs; Japan as a global economic power with growing international responsibilities; a somewhat more open China; a more activist Australia with major trade links to Japan and a substantially more powerful and growing Soviet presence. These developments increasingly engage major US interests.

—US trade is shifting toward the Pacific. In 1981 US Asia-Pacific trade surpassed trade with all of Western Europe. If our key trading partners, Mexico and Canada (also Pacific nations) were included, this shift would appear even more pronounced (see Table II).⁵ In addition to major trade in consumer goods and machinery, the US relies on the Pacific for more than 90% of its natural rubber, and large amounts of imported wool, tin, meat, plywood, bauxite, sugar and oil. In the latter part of 1981 Indonesia replaced Nigeria as our second largest source of oil, after Saudi Arabia. On the export side, the Pacific has now surpassed the EEC as our largest market for agricultural products (see Table IV).⁶

—The Pacific is an area of comparative stability at present, despite deep antagonisms and substantial military imbalances. These latter factors also make it prone to instability, should current political balances be disrupted.

(B) US Interests and Objectives in the Pacific Region

The US is the only major Pacific power, in a comprehensive sense (political/military/economic). It enjoys significant trade and positive political relationships with most nations of the region (an advantage not shared by the USSR). US interests and objectives in the region should include:

—Strengthening of formal and informal security cooperation with and among friendly states, so as to create a favorable security environment in which the enormous potential of the region can be realized. In this context, should the US encourage: (1) greater reliance on American power; (2) greater self-reliance; (3) greater reliance on other regional powers (such as Australia and Japan); or (4) some combination of these strategies?

⁵ Not attached is Table II, "US Trade With Major Areas 1981."

⁶ Not attached is Table IV, "Rank of Country as Importer of Commodity from the US in 1981."

—Promotion of communication/cooperation among friendly states in the area (e.g., closer Japan-ROK, Japan-Australia, ROK-ASEAN, Australia-ASEAN-Pacific Island ties) as a means of strengthening regional political stability.

—Strengthening economic ties with the growing economies of the region in a manner which will promote strong economies and the free trading system, counteract protectionist pressures, and create a strong market for US exports.

—Encouragement of economic growth in regional LDCs through balanced multilateral and bilateral aid, and private sector involvement (e.g., investment and technology transfer).

(C) Other Possible Objectives of a Comprehensive "Pacific" Approach

—Develop a comprehensive global policy, more effectively linking friends and interests in the Atlantic with those in the Pacific.

—Develop a coherent focus of US interest outside Europe, as a means of developing visible alternatives to a Euro-centered strategy.

—Improve US export competitiveness through the development of a more effective working relationship between the US Government and business communities.

—Develop an initiative which would add a new sense of dynamism and direction to US foreign policy, and help to build and maintain the domestic consensus needed to maintain a strong US role in the Pacific.

II. US Policy: What Basis for a Regional Focus?

(A) Pacific Rim vs. Pacific-Oriented Countries

(1) Location on the Pacific Rim alone does not create shared interests. The core of a Pacific policy should focus on these states with a common Pacific orientation. Such an orientation clearly exists among the US, Japan, Australia/New Zealand, ASEAN, South Korea, Taiwan, Hong Kong, and (on a smaller scale) the Pacific Island states. Common interests include market-oriented economic systems, significant trade, investment and capital flows, a greater or lesser adherence to Western democratic values, and shared (explicit or implicit) security concerns.

(2) Canada and Mexico, though not fundamentally oriented toward the Pacific, are also Pacific nations. As our #1 and #3 trading partners Canada and Mexico, when taken together with East Asia, constitute the top three areas of US economic interest, aside from Western Europe.

(3) The Pacific countries of Latin America are seeking to expand their Pacific ties, and therefore should not be excluded from a Pacific policy. For the moment, however, their hemispheric orientation suggests that they relate to US Pacific-wide interests in only a secondary sense.

(4) The Soviet Union at present relates to US and other Pacific-area interests primarily—but very importantly—in the security area.⁷ Our desire to encourage the constructive integration of China into the world community suggests that China should clearly be part of our Pacific policy. Chinese security concerns and developmental objectives link it to the US and the Pacific. The overlap of shared interests is only partial, however, and systemic differences may, for the time being, preclude integration of the PRC into a broader Pacific community.

(B) How Do US Interests Interact with Those of the Other Pacific Nations?

(1) Trade and Economic

There is considerable regional interdependence in trade flows. The pattern, however, is asymmetrical, with domination by the US and Japan. With the exception of the United States and Japan, whose regional trade is only a fraction of their global trade, all market economies in the Asia-Pacific region do over 50% of their trade within the region. The importance of regional trade is greatest for the LDCs. The NICs fall in the middle, with heavy regional trade, but a declining fraction of the total as they seek to expand into wider global markets. (See Table I.)⁸

Significant interdependence also exists in regional investment and aid flows, with the US and Japan again as the principal investors/donors (this is despite the fact that US investment in East Asia—$22 billion in 1981—is only about 11% of total overseas investment, and US bilateral aid to the region is significantly less than it was 10 years ago).

(2) Political Interests

A sense of political community is at best incipient. Outside of already-existing groupings, the region is divided by distance, ideology (in the case of the Communist states), history (e.g., profound historic animosities toward Japan that affect relations with Korea, China and the ASEANs), economic competition (between the US and Japan and among several of the NICs), and aligned/non-aligned distinctions. Nevertheless, shared political interests do exist. Common security concerns underlie political and military ties with the US and in some cases with each other. Growing trade ties serve as a unifying as well as a dividing force. Generally harmonious relations with the US and an array of shared bilateral US interests with nearly all Pacific nations is a further thread which runs throughout the Pacific Basin.

⁷ An unknown hand changed “related” to “relates.”

(3) Security

All states in the Pacific (with the exception of the USSR, North Korea, and Indochina), whether aligned or non-aligned, share a common interest in preventing the growth of Soviet regional power. To a greater or lesser extent, all states (outside of the South Pacific and the PRC itself) share a common fear of China. On both counts, the US is looked to as the explicit or implicit guarantor of regional security. This reliance could increase if Sino-Soviet tensions were to significantly lessen. With US support providing the underpinning of Pacific area stability, from a security perspective the region should be looked at as a whole.

In the wake of the US withdrawal from Vietnam and declining global capabilities during the Carter Administration, deep and persistent doubts remain in Asia concerning the reliability of US defense commitments. While progress has been made during the past two years in reassuring Asian friends and allies, continued efforts will be required to demonstrate our sustained role as a Pacific power.

At present we have no pressing security problems in the Pacific. We should not forget, however, that this is the area where the US has fought its two major post World War II conflicts. This is no accident. Though quiescent, there are great military imbalances in the region. The local balance favors the USSR, the PRC, Vietnam and North Korea, leading to a heavy dependence on the US for a countervailing role. That dependence is aggravated by the rapid increase of Soviet military forces in the area. The substantial stability of recent years is in part a product of tensions and conflicts among actual or potentially hostile countries. This situation makes the US continually vulnerable to the possibility of a Sino-Soviet rapprochement, and individual national susceptible to political or military intimidation.⁹

(C) Has the US Given Sufficient Attention to Its Pacific Ties?

—Growing US interests in the Pacific Basin, both economic and political, may require greater US engagement.

⁹ An unknown hand changed "national" to "nations."

—While lacking the same ties of history and culture, our present level of Pacific involvement has grown to the point where it is arguably comparable to the Atlantic. We should consider, therefore, moving toward a policy which would place our Pacific and Atlantic relationships more on a par.

III. Proposals for a “Pacific Community” Mechanism

Over the past 15 years a number of proposals have been made for the formation of a Pacific Basin-wide organization, to draw together the threads of an incipient Pacific Community.

(A) Structure

—First officially articulated by the Japanese in 1967 with a proposal for a Pacific Free Trade Area (PAFTA). PAFTA was to function as an equivalent and counterweight to the EEC. This idea led to the initiation of a conference series, the Pacific Trade and Development Conference (PAFTAD), which has included eleven meetings since 1968. Participants have been mostly academics and businessmen.

—Organization for Pacific Trade and Development (OPTAD) was proposed by the Conference as a successor concept to PAFTA. OPTAD would be modeled after the OECD, and would include the five Pacific members of OECD, the ASEANs and South Korea, with special status for Taiwan, Hong Kong and the Pacific Island states. Its organization would consist of a secretariat in each member country with regional problems being dealt with on a task force basis.

—Other proposals for Pacific Basin cooperation include the formation of a private, non-governmental body with limited consultative functions, as a preliminary step toward an OPTAD-type structure.

—In 1978 Japan’s Prime Minister Ohira added new impetus to the discussion by publicly calling for a new Pacific area association. Further momentum was also given by the Canberra Pacific Community Seminar, held in Australia in September 1980 pursuant to a joint communique by the Japanese and Australian governments.¹⁰ It also became clear in Canberra, however, that there existed substantial ASEAN opposition to the setting up of a Pacific-wide inter-governmental organization. The result was the establishment of a Pacific Cooperation Committee (PCC), which was to be a private, informal body composed of 25 unofficial representatives of the countries attending the conference.

—On July 31 of this year South Korea's President Chun Doo Hwan issued a call for a Pacific Basin Summit.¹¹

(B) Attitudes of Pacific Nations

—Japan has historically been the strongest proponent of a Pacific Basin Community. (Japan has an important interest in regional stability and open markets, as its principal markets and sources of raw materials are in or pass through the region.)

—Significant support exists in Australia, on an unofficial basis (as demonstrated by PM Fraser's backing for the 1980 Canberra Conference).

—South Korea can be presumed to be supportive.

—ASEAN, which is essential to any Pacific organization, is skeptical. The ASEANs are concerned that:

- (1) the concept remains too unfocused to be of interest;
- (2) the United States and Japan will dominate any Pacific region organization;
- (3) ASEAN's non-aligned status will be compromised by great power involvement;
- (4) ASEAN as an organization will be submerged or divided;
- (5) economic benefits may also entail political costs (in terms of sovereignty).

—The US has taken a non-committal position. While offering passive support, we have been clearly unenthusiastic.

IV. Possible US Strategies (Should We Support a Pacific Mechanism?)

It should be considered whether a bilateral approach to regional problems alone is sufficient. US interests are currently being effectively served by bilateral diplomacy, but emerging regional challenges—particularly in the fields of trade, investment, aid, and resource development—suggest that a broader, multilateral approach could serve as an effective supplement. Possible options are:

¹¹ In telegram 8123 from Seoul, August 4, the Embassy discussed Chun's proposal, outlining the five principles designed to aid in the creation of a "Great Pacific Age," noting: "The proposal remains vague, but the ROKG seems determined to pursue the idea despite the apparent lack of enthusiasm for it on the part of other potential participants." (Department of State, Central Foreign Policy File, Electronic Telegrams, D820404-0008)

(A) Continue Our Present Bilateral Approach Essentially Unchanged

Outside of annual consultations with ANZUS and ASEAN, US problems and objectives in the Pacific region are addressed on an essentially bilateral basis. Continuation of this policy would conserve resources and avoid the compromises which necessarily come with broader multilateral endeavors. Regarding a possible Pacific Community organization, the United States would aim to let the idea mature at a private level before committing itself to government involvement. Without active US support, it can be expected that the Pacific Basin concept will not advance in the near future beyond private and academic circles.

(B) Assume a More Active Posture

(1) Expand our Existing Bilateral Efforts

This should include increased conceptual focus within the Department on means for enhancing our Pacific relationships. The level and number of high-level visits might be expanded. Bilateral consultations on subjects of mutual interest (military as well as economic and political) could be intensified. In addition, thought should be given to the shifting of additional human and financial resources to the Pacific area.

(2) In Addition to Expanding Bilateral Efforts, Consider Moving in the Direction of a Multilateral Approach to the Pacific, Looking Toward Making First Steps to Build a Pacific Community Consultative Mechanism.

This approach would focus on the Pacific area in a manner both directly and indirectly supportive of US interests. Common concerns might be addressed through either:

(a) a broadly-based, general consultative mechanism; or

(b) more narrowly-focused, functionally-oriented working groups, organized initially on an ad hoc basis.

Initial topics for region-wide consultation might include the promotion of regional trade and investment, the management of trading relationships so as to forestall protectionism and support the free market system, the coordination of regional aid flows, the facilitation of technology transfer, or the management of marine resources. Though essentially economic, common efforts along the above lines could have the added advantage of indirectly nurturing support for US political and strategic interests in the Pacific by encouraging a general perception of shared interests among nations friendly to the US and emphasizing US interest in the Pacific.

115. Memorandum From the Director of the Policy Planning Staff (Wolfowitz) to Secretary of State Shultz¹

Washington, August 27, 1982

SUBJECT

Soviet Strategy Seminar

You opened Saturday's meeting² by asking the participants' view of the Soviet Union and of the relationship we should seek with it. The discussion that followed brought to light three fundamentally different approaches to Soviet-American relations, with disagreements among them centering on whether and how the two sides' competition can be moderated. There was the familiar disagreement between the view that it can be moderated only by the break-up of the Soviet Union, and alternately, the view that it can be adequately moderated by the right bargaining approach on issues that affect Soviet interests. A third analysis, which emphasized the importance of blocking Soviet opportunities, assumed no fundamental moderation is possible.

Not every participant, of course, fits neatly into the following description of these views. This is sometimes due to shadings in their view, sometimes to outright contradiction.

Three Outlooks

1. For the bargainers, the key to a satisfactory relationship lies in positioning ourselves to maximize our bilateral leverage. There is a potential for mutual accommodation, created by the vulnerabilities of the Soviet system (and resultant Soviet caution). Yet to exploit this potential several steps are needed: trade must increase substantially, the U.S. government must acquire the legal power and flexibility to control trade, and we must earn European confidence and cooperation by setting out a balanced strategy for using this leverage. To further strengthen this cooperation, we must also assign the highest Secret; Sensitive. Shultz's stamped initials appear on the memorandum. Wolfowitz sent the memorandum to Shultz under an August 27 typewritten note, stating: "Attached is a broad-brush summary of what emerged to me as the most interesting aspect of last weekend's discussion of Soviet policy: the broad distinction among three quite different schools of thought. There was much more useful detail and many more thoughts in my head that I would still like to get down on paper, but this should be a useful first installment." (Ibid.) ² August 21.

priority, not only to conducting arms talks, but to the early conclusion of an agreement, even though its impact on the overall balance is expected to be negligible. The bargainers favor other agreements as well, and express confidence that the use of rewards and penalties will facilitate “rules of the game” for competition in the Third World. Although based on a picture of Soviet weakness, this view foresees an enduring relationship even as the weakness passes: our task is to limit the Soviet Union’s misbehavior, and this will be possible even as it prospers.

2. For the proponents of breaking the Soviet Union up, the West’s only choice is between a Soviet demise and the “Finlandization” of Europe. With no basis left for a stable relationship, contacts must be kept to a minimum. Arms control merely unravels our defense efforts, and trade merely creates reverse leverage against the West; in this way, the Soviets have exploited Western internal weakness in the past. Now, however, the application of economic pressures is the key to Western success: the Soviet Union’s internal weakness (above all, its economic crisis) is great enough to bring it down, if—and only if—the US squeezes. To do so requires the same government control over economic relations that the bargainers desire. On the basis of such an all-out struggle, the problem of managing Western public opinion can also be solved: our leaders, rather than offer a complex and multifaceted relationship with the enemy, can now hold out victory. (They do not, however, have to scare our people: the pressure tactics of the break-up school are “risk-free.”)

3. Those who focus on blocking Soviet misbehavior spell out the implications of concluding that the competition cannot be fundamentally moderated: first, that overturning the Soviet system requires more leverage than we have; second, that bargaining directly with the Soviets—on trade or arms control—gives us less leverage than we need. Effective leverage comes instead from creating an environment in which Soviet opportunities are limited, and Soviet advances can be resisted—through an improved military balance, cooperation with like-minded states, and promotion of political and economic stability. Trade and arms control are not incompatible with this approach, but the marginal benefits they yield must be strictly weighed against the confusing signals they send our own public. Economic pressures are also not incompatible, but because they too yield only marginal benefits these have to be weighed against the damage done to our efforts to promote cooperation and unity with other states.

Assessment

All three of these outlooks are found in the Administration, and obviously have some ground in common. In particular, all emphasize the importance of pursuing a policy that can sustain public support over the long term. You heard some sophisticated advice from all sides about managing this difficult problem:

—The bargaining partisans point out that a showy openness to negotiation is not enough. To command the public and allied support that will strengthen our negotiating hand, we need a convincing strategy that promises results, that can get from here to there.

—The break-up advocates would sustain public support by stating our differences with the Soviets in maximum terms, in principled, ideological rhetoric.

Yet both of these analyses expect to put the Soviet-American relationship on a new basis, and for this reason they may compromise sustainability for other goals. For example:

—The bargainers set an extremely stiff test for showing that our policy is realistic and effective: in this way an early arms agreement becomes a top priority. The paradoxical conclusion is that the only way to sustain a long-term competitive posture is to satisfy the public's desire for an end to competition. In practice, this may be simply self-defeating.

—The bargainers' view of economic leverage makes the same compromise. To strengthen our hand in the long run, we have to increase the US share of East-West trade; in the short run, this is not likely to convince our allies to practice restraint. If it does not, our leverage will not increase.

—The break-up school similarly compromises its long-term prospects for a massive effort in the short run. Our allies and our publics will demand early results, which may prove unattainable.

Implications

The problem of sustainability, by contrast, looks most acute to those who envision continuing Soviet opportunities throughout (and beyond) this decade. The blocking strategy you heard at the meeting rejected our bilateral leverage toward the Soviets as marginal. In this view, there is less to be gained and more to be lost by nuanced use of rewards and penalties. The key word here is "simplicity." The economic, diplomatic and security dimensions of our policy must be consistent.

This seemed to me a very powerful line of argument. The Soviet Union retains considerable flexibility and our policy must serve us whether the Soviets hunker down for a few years or take a more confrontational line. One difficult problem is left unresolved, however: our approach to negotiation. The public wants consistency but it also wants all means for resolving conflicts explored. And those who have least hope of moderating the competition for good are always suspected of negotiating half-heartedly.

If we are not to be whip-sawed by these conflicting pressures, we need a fuller negotiating strategy, particularly for arms control, but extending to other areas as well. We run risks whether we stand indefinitely by radical proposals or fall back to positions that seem to call the competition off. To resolve this problem, we need to see the fundamental difference between agreements that put the competition on a new, qualitatively safer basis and those that affect it marginally at best. In the right circumstances, either one can be acceptable as long as we know—and the public knows—which is which. If we are settling for second-best, it should be clear that we are settling, and that the broader competition goes on. An innovative approach (botched in the follow-up) to solving this problem was the Carter Administration's March 1977 double offer on SALT: letting the Soviets choose between major and marginal change. Our problems are a bit different now, but this may not be a bad model for our relationship as a whole.

116. Address by President Reagan to the Nation¹

Burbank, California, September 1, 1982

Address to the Nation on United States Policy for Peace in the Middle East

My fellow Americans:

Today has been a day that should make us proud. It marked the end of the successful evacuation of PLO from Beirut, Lebanon.² This peaceful step could never have been taken without the good offices

² On August 20, the President announced the agreement reached by the Governments of Lebanon, the United States, France, Italy, and Israel, and the PLO to a plan for the departure of the PLO from Lebanon. The President's statement and the text of the departure plan are printed in Department of State Bulletin, September 1982, pp. 1–3, and 5. of the United States and especially the truly heroic work of a great American diplomat, Ambassador Philip Habib.

Thanks to his efforts, I'm happy to announce that the U.S. Marine contingent helping to supervise the evacuation has accomplished its mission. Our young men should be out of Lebanon within 2 weeks. They, too, have served the cause of peace with distinction, and we can all be very proud of them.

But the situation in Lebanon is only part of the overall problem of conflict in the Middle East. So, over the past 2 weeks, while events in Beirut dominated the front page, America was engaged in a quiet, behind-the-scenes effort to lay the groundwork for a broader peace in the region. For once there were no premature leaks as U.S. diplomatic missions traveled to Mideast capitals, and I met here at home with a wide range of experts to map out an American peace initiative for the long-suffering peoples of the Middle East—Arab and Israeli alike.

It seemed to me that with the agreement in Lebanon we had an opportunity for a more far-reaching peace effort in the region, and I was determined to seize that moment. In the words of the scripture, the time had come to "follow after the things which make for peace." Tonight I want to report to you the steps we've taken and the prospects they can open up for a just and lasting peace in the Middle East.

America has long been committed to bringing peace to this troubled region. For more than a generation, successive United States administrations have endeavored to develop a fair and workable process that could lead to a true and lasting Arab-Israeli peace.

Our involvement in the search for Mideast peace is not a matter of preference; it's a moral imperative. The strategic importance of the region to the United States is well known, but our policy is motivated by more than strategic interests. We also have an irreversible commitment to the survival and territorial integrity of friendly states. Nor can we ignore the fact that the well-being of much of the world's economy is tied to stability in the strife-torn Middle East. Finally, our traditional humanitarian concerns dictated a continuing effort to peacefully resolve conflicts.

When our administration assumed office in January of 1981, I decided that the general framework for our Middle East policy should follow the broad guidelines laid down by my predecessors. There were two basic issues we had to address. First, there was the strategic threat to the region posed by the Soviet Union and its surrogates, best demonstrated by the brutal war in Afghanistan, and, second, the peace process between Israel and its Arab neighbors.

With regard to the Soviet threat, we have strengthened our efforts to develop with our friends and allies a joint policy to deter the Soviets and their surrogates from further expansion in the region and, if necessary, to defend against it.

With respect to the Arab-Israeli conflict, we've embraced the Camp David framework as the only way to proceed. We have also recognized, however, solving the Arab-Israeli conflict in and of itself cannot assure peace throughout a region as vast and troubled as the Middle East.

Our first objective under the Camp David process was to ensure the successful fulfillment of the Egyptian-Israeli peace treaty. This was achieved with the peaceful return of the Sinai to Egypt in April 1982.³ To accomplish this, we worked hard with our Egyptian and Israeli friends and, eventually, with other friendly countries to create the multinational force which now operates in the Sinai. Throughout this period of difficult and time-consuming negotiations, we never lost sight of the next step of Camp David—autonomy talks to pave the way for permitting the Palestinian people to exercise their legitimate rights. However, owing to the tragic assassination of President Sadat and other crises in the area, it was not until January 1982 that we were able to make a major effort to renew these talks.

Secretary of State Haig and Ambassador Fairbanks made three visits to Israel and Egypt early this year to pursue the autonomy talks.⁴ Considerable progress was made in developing the basic outline of an American approach which was to be presented to Egypt and Israel after April.

The successful completion of Israel's withdrawal from Sinai and the courage shown on this occasion by Prime Minister Begin and President Mubarak in living up to their agreements convinced me the time had come for a new American policy to try to bridge the remaining differences between Egypt and Israel on the autonomy process. So, in May I called for specific measures and a timetable for consultations with the Governments of Egypt and Israel on the next steps in the peace process. However, before this effort could be launched, the conflict in Lebanon preempted our efforts.⁵

The autonomy talks were basically put on hold while we sought to untangle the parties in Lebanon and still the guns of war. The Lebanon war, tragic as it was, has left us with a new opportunity for

Middle East peace. We must seize it now and bring peace to this troubled area so vital to world stability while there is still time. It was with this strong conviction that over a month ago, before the present negotiations in Beirut had been completed, I directed Secretary of State Shultz to again review our policy and to consult a wide range of outstanding Americans on the best ways to strengthen chances for peace in the Middle East.⁶

We have consulted with many of the officials who were historically involved in the process, with Members of the Congress,⁷ and with individuals from the private sector. And I have held extensive consultations with my own advisers on the principles that I will outline to you tonight.

The evacuation of the PLO from Beirut is now complete, and we can now help the Lebanese to rebuild their war-torn country. We owe it to ourselves and to posterity to move quickly to build upon this achievement. A stable and revived Lebanon is essential to all our hopes for peace in the region. The people of Lebanon deserve the best efforts of the international community to turn the nightmares of the past several years into a new dawn of hope. But the opportunities for peace in the Middle East do not begin and end in Lebanon. As we help Lebanon rebuild, we must also move to resolve the root causes of conflict between Arabs and Israelis.

The war in Lebanon has demonstrated many things, but two consequences are key to the peace process. First, the military losses of the PLO have not diminished the yearning of the Palestinian people for a just solution of their claims; and, second, while Israel's military successes in Lebanon have demonstrated that its armed forces are second to none in the region, they alone cannot bring just and lasting peace to Israel and her neighbors.

⁶In his memoir, Shultz indicated that "President Reagan, in our early conversations, had encouraged me to develop my ideas as well as a strategy to reinvigorate Middle East diplomacy. My first Saturday seminar on July 17 got the ball rolling. I then collected a small core group to work with me on the details of the new strategy. I knew that total secrecy would be required. Any premature hint that the United States was reconsidering its position on the Palestinian issue would have disruptive effects not only on Phil Habib's work in getting the PLO out of Beirut but also on the ability of the United States to make something positive emerge from this terrible war. I called together a very few of our people, swore them to total secrecy, and told them we needed to hammer out a new approach within a few weeks. What I wanted was a fresh start to the Middle East peace process." (Shultz, Turmoil and Triumph, p. 85)

⁷Shultz briefed members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on August 17 and the House Foreign Affairs Committee on August 18 regarding the initiative. See, for example, "Shultz Solicits Views on Palestinians' Future," August 17, 1982, p. A14, and Bernard Gwertzman, "Shultz on the Hill: Not Your Usual 'Consultations'," August 19, 1982, p. B10; both New York Times.

The question now is how to reconcile Israel's legitimate security concerns with the legitimate rights of the Palestinians. And that answer can only come at the negotiating table. Each party must recognize that the outcome must be acceptable to all and that true peace will require compromises by all.

So, tonight I'm calling for a fresh start. This is the moment for all those directly concerned to get involved—or lend their support—to a workable basis for peace. The Camp David agreement remains the foundation of our policy. Its language provides all parties with the leeway they need for successful negotiations.

I call on Israel to make clear that the security for which she yearns can only be achieved through genuine peace, a peace requiring magnanimity, vision, and courage.

I call on the Palestinian people to recognize that their own political aspirations are inextricably bound to recognition of Israel's right to a secure future.

And I call on the Arab States to accept the reality of Israel—and the reality that peace and justice are to be gained only through hard, fair, direct negotiation.

In making these calls upon others, I recognize that the United States has a special responsibility. No other nation is in a position to deal with the key parties to the conflict on the basis of trust and reliability.

The time has come for a new realism on the part of all the peoples of the Middle East. The State of Israel is an accomplished fact; it deserves unchallenged legitimacy within the community of nations. But Israel's legitimacy has thus far been recognized by too few countries and has been denied by every Arab State except Egypt. Israel exists; it has a right to exist in peace behind secure and defensible borders; and it has a right to demand of its neighbors that they recognize those facts.

I have personally followed and supported Israel's heroic struggle for survival, ever since the founding of the State of Israel 34 years ago. In the pre-1967 borders Israel was barely 10 miles wide at its narrowest point. The bulk of Israel's population lived within artillery range of hostile Arab armies. I am not about to ask Israel to live that way again.

The war in Lebanon has demonstrated another reality in the region. The departure of the Palestinians from Beirut dramatizes more than ever the homelessness of the Palestinian people. Palestinians feel strongly that their cause is more than a question of refugees. I agree. The Camp David agreement recognized that fact when it spoke of the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people and their just requirements.

For peace to endure it must involve all those who have been most deeply affected by the conflict. Only through broader participation in the peace process, most immediately by Jordan and by the Palestinians, will Israel be able to rest confident in the knowledge that its security and integrity will be respected by its neighbors. Only through the process of negotiation can all the nations of the Middle East achieve a secure peace.

These, then, are our general goals. What are the specific new American positions, and why are we taking them? In the Camp David talks thus far, both Israel and Egypt have felt free to express openly their views as to what the outcome should be. Understandably their views have differed on many points. The United States has thus far sought to play the role of mediator. We have avoided public comment on the key issues. We have always recognized and continue to recognize that only the voluntary agreement of those parties most directly involved in the conflict can provide an enduring solution. But it's become evident to me that some clearer sense of American's position on the key issues is necessary to encourage wider support for the peace process.

First, as outlined in the Camp David accords, there must be a period of time during which the Palestinian inhabitants of the West Bank and Gaza will have full autonomy over their own affairs. Due consideration must be given to the principle of self-government by the inhabitants of the territories and to the legitimate security concerns of the parties involved. The purpose of the 5-year period of transition which would begin after free elections for a self-governing Palestinian authority is to prove to the Palestinians that they can run their own affairs and that such Palestinian autonomy poses no threat to Israel's security.

The United States will not support the use of any additional land for the purpose of settlements during the transitional period. Indeed, the immediate adoption of a settlement freeze by Israel, more than any other action, could create the confidence needed for wider participation in these talks. Further settlement activity is in no way necessary for the security of Israel and only diminishes the confidence of the Arabs that a final outcome can be freely and fairly negotiated.

I want to make the American position well understood. The purpose of this transitional period is the peaceful and orderly transfer of authority from Israel to the Palestinian inhabitants of the West Bank and Gaza. At the same time, such a transfer must not interfere with Israel's security requirements.

Beyond the transition period, as we look to the future of the West Bank and Gaza, it is clear to me that peace cannot be achieved by the formation of an independent Palestinian state in those territories, nor is it achievable on the basis of Israeli sovereignty or permanent control over the West Bank and Gaza. So, the United States will not support the establishment of an independent Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza, and we will not support annexation or permanent control by Israel.

There is, however, another way to peace. The final status of these lands must, of course, be reached through the give and take of negotiations. But it is the firm view of the United States that self-government by the Palestinians of the West Bank and Gaza in association with Jordan offers the best chance for a durable, just, and lasting peace. We base our approach squarely on the principle that the Arab-Israeli conflict should be resolved through negotiations involving an exchange of territory for peace.

This exchange is enshrined in United Nations Security Council Resolution 242, which is, in turn, incorporated in all its parts in the Camp David agreements.⁸ U.N. Resolution 242 remains wholly valid as the foundation stone of America's Middle East peace effort. It is the United States position that, in return for peace, the withdrawal provision of Resolution 242 applies to all fronts, including the West Bank and Gaza. When the border is negotiated between Jordan and Israel, our view on the extent to which Israel should be asked to give up territory will be heavily affected by the extent of true peace and normalization, and the security arrangements offered in return.

Finally, we remain convinced that Jerusalem must remain undivided, but its final status should be decided through negotiation.

In the course of the negotiations to come, the United States will support positions that seem to us fair and reasonable compromises and likely to promote a sound agreement. We will also put forward our own detailed proposals when we believe they can be helpful. And, make no mistake, the United States will oppose any proposal from any party and at any point in the negotiating process that threatens the security of Israel. America's commitment to the security of Israel is ironclad, and, I might add, so is mine.

During the past few days, our Ambassadors in Israel, Egypt, Jordan, and Saudi Arabia have presented to their host governments the proposals, in full detail, that I have outlined here today.⁹ Now I'm convinced that these proposals can bring justice, bring security, and bring durability to an Arab-Israeli peace. The United States will stand by these principles with total dedication. They are fully consistent with Israel's security requirements and the aspirations of the Palestinians.

We will work hard to broaden participation at the peace table as envisaged by the Camp David accords. And I fervently hope that the Palestinians and Jordan, with the support of their Arab colleagues, will accept this opportunity.

Tragic turmoil in the Middle East runs back to the dawn of history. In our modern day, conflict after conflict has taken its brutal toll there. In an age of nuclear challenge and economic interdependence, such conflicts are a threat to all the people of the world, not just the Middle East itself. It's time for us all—in the Middle East and around the world—to call a halt to conflict, hatred, and prejudice. It's time for us all to launch a common effort for reconstruction, peace, and progress.

It has often been said—and, regrettably, too often been true—that the story of the search for peace and justice in the Middle East is a tragedy of opportunities missed. In the aftermath of the settlement in Lebanon, we now face an opportunity for a broader peace. This time we must not let it slip from our grasp. We must look beyond the difficulties and obstacles of the present and move with a fairness and resolve toward a brighter future. We owe it to ourselves—and to posterity—to do no less. For if we miss this chance to make a fresh start, we may look back on this moment from some later vantage point and realize how much that failure cost us all.

These, then, are the principles upon which American policy toward the Arab-Israeli conflict will be based. I have made a personal commitment to see that they endure and, God willing, that they will come to be seen by all reasonable, compassionate people as fair, achievable, and in the interests of all who wish to see peace in the Middle East.

Tonight, on the eve of what can be a dawning of new hope for the people of the troubled Middle East—and for all the world's people who dream of a just and peaceful future—I ask you, my fellow Americans for your support and your prayers in this great undertaking.

Thank you, and God bless you.

SUBJECT

General Foreign Policy Framework

You know of my concern that we develop a coherent vision of what we want to achieve over the next two years, lest we remain hostage to events and find ourselves unable to explain, much less execute, a consistent, purposeful foreign policy. The Administration's original emphasis, quite rightly, was on rebuilding American strength and credibility. But we have failed to articulate, except in piecemeal fashion, how we intend to use our refound strength and credibility to improve the international order and advance our interests.

I would like you to consider the attached package, which contains some preliminary thoughts on where we should be headed. The central theme of the core paper (Tab 1) is that strengthening the fabric of the non-communist world—politically, economically, and strategically—is a necessary complement to a policy of restraining the Soviet Union. This does not imply a shift in emphasis from the last two years. Rather, it completes an overall concept of how the US can advance its strategic interests and strengthen international order in this dangerous decade and the next. The concept places a premium on the revitalization of Western institutions, a drawing together of the West and the Third World, and the fostering of a non-communist order based on peaceful change and the rule of law.

This is by no means an approach free of controversy or cost, if we push beyond mere slogans. It envisions, inter alia, an intensive effort to overcome political differences with key countries (e.g., Germany, China, Saudi Arabia), an effort to bring developing countries more fully into the Western economic—and, less directly, security—system, and a program of improving international peacekeeping/peacemaking mechanisms. It contemplates a continued willingness on the part of the US to shoulder the burden of “system maintenance”, while recognizing that we are more dependent than ever on the cooperation of our partners. It calls for no radical departures. Indeed, it incorporates some of the initiatives we already have underway, but in a more integrated way than we've done so far.

This core paper is not meant to be a detailed blueprint. But it could, with your imprint, serve as a general guide to help form specific regional and functional policies. More refined thinking is needed, though this framework can provide a common conceptual reference point. An agenda of specific policy reviews is also attached (Tab 2).² Some of these studies (e.g., those on international economic policy) are already underway; but these should now be viewed in light of the general framework.

You'll notice that I've suggested a study on rebuilding bipartisan support for foreign policy. With the possible exception of the nuclear arms race issue, I see no foreign policy question on the horizon with the potential to divide the country as severely as Vietnam and detente. Moreover, a general framework of the sort presented here should evoke broad support. So we have an opportunity—the first in a generation—to rebuild a bipartisan foreign policy, and we should seize that opportunity.

I would welcome your reactions. At a minimum, this paper will, I hope, help you organize your thoughts about what we should be trying to achieve. Beyond that, you may want to plan a relaxed discussion with your principal officers. You might also want to discuss it with an outsider or two. I stand ready to refine—or overhaul—the paper if you decide it's worth coming up with a finished product to send to the President or simply circulate in the Department.³

TOWARD A STRONGER NON-COMMUNIST ORDER

Introduction: Basic U.S. Interests and the International System

With an eye to the past and an eye to the future, the US intended the Post-War order to serve three purposes, each crucial to American strategic and, secondarily, economic interests: (1) to facilitate recovery, prosperity and stability in the West; (2) to provide for peaceful settlement of disputes; (3) to prevent Soviet expansion. While the basic purposes remain valid, the order is in need of rehabilitation if it is to serve and advance our national interests for the remainder of the century. Each of the main elements needs attention:

(1) The political-economic health and integrity of the advanced industrialized West is endangered by protracted recession, lack of cooperation, a reduced sense of responsibility among some of the key partners, and the failure of societies to adapt as their economies have evolved.

(2) The Third World has become more important strategically, yet prospects for peaceful change and stability remain poor, owing to artificial boundaries, Soviet subversion, uneven (at best) economic development, lack of sustained Western interest, immature political institutions, and the failure of international mechanisms to help settle disputes.

(3) East-West stability has remained elusive, largely because US efforts to remain strong have been cyclical, while Soviet efforts to grow stronger have been unrelenting.

In its first two years, the Administration's emphasis has been on restoring American power, credibility, and leadership—the premise being that in the absence of these qualities our vital interests cannot be preserved. This emphasis, coupled with recent Soviet failures and greater awareness of Soviet vulnerabilities, has begun to reduce a decade's accumulation of doubts about America's will and ability to restrain the Soviet Union.

But the economic health and political integrity of the West—crucial in their own right to US interests as well as in helping us compete effectively with the Soviet Union—have not fared well. Nor has the Third ⁵Secret. No drafting information appears on the paper.

World grown less susceptible to Soviet encroachment, though developing countries are growing more suspicious of the Soviets. Finally, despite the move toward a more robust U.S. military posture, we face major political obstacles in strengthening relationships which are crucial in maintaining and improving our position in four key strategic arenas: Central Europe, Southwest Asia, East Asia, and Central America. In sum, owing to our own efforts and Soviet failures, there has been an erosion in our adversary's position, but the fabric of our own order has become weaker and, in places, torn.

Against this backdrop, the main task for the next two years must be to strengthen the non-communist international order. The main elements of this task are:

- (1) to foster political-economic health in the West;
- (2) to build partnerships in the four key strategic arenas;
- (3) to draw the Third World closer to the West and erect regional barriers to Soviet influence, presence, and subversion;
- (4) to intensify the quest and strengthen mechanisms for peaceful settlement of disputes.

Within two years, we would like to see a non-communist order—of which the Third World is increasingly an integral part—which is more capable of peaceful change, more conducive to economic growth, and more resistant to Soviet disruption. Such an order would be more peaceful, more lawful, more prosperous, and more hospitable for American strategic and economic interests than is today's world. To the degree that it also serves our partner's interests, they will feel a stronger sense of responsibility, a greater willingness to share the burden, and a view closer to our own about how to deal with the East. Success in strengthening the non-communist order will yield lasting advantages to the US in its historic competition with the USSR.

This is not to suggest that the effort to expand American power and remove doubts about our resolve can be relaxed. Indeed, if it is thought that we will retreat from our military program and fail to act when our interests are threatened, the effort to rehabilitate the non-communist order will be stillborn.

I. A Healthier Western Political-Economy

Preserving an open trading system will not guarantee Western economic recovery; but protectionism is sure to retard recovery. Moreover, whereas allies can compete commercially and still be allies, security cooperation and political trust are sure to suffer if competition turns to economic confrontation and to efforts to shift both the costs and the blame.

Because of our strategic interests, our economic interests (especially with the US economy becoming more exposed to the world economy), and the fact that only we have the political stature and purposefulness to take the lead, we should be prepared—indeed determined—to:

—break the protectionist cycle and be the most relentless, principled advocate of open, non-discriminatory trading;

—reinvigorate—and, where necessary, adapt—trade, monetary investment, banking, and energy institutions within the advanced industrialized “family”;

—develop cooperative efforts to hasten recovery without fueling inflation;

—create mature US–EC, US–Japan—and, ideally, EC–Japan—relationships, such as through innovative consultation procedures and joint anticipation of problems;

—work out a consensus on rules and goals to govern economic relations with the USSR and with Eastern Europe;

—develop a strategy for drawing the Third World closer to the West, economically and politically, and promoting solvency.

Recognizing that our partners follow interventionist economic and industrial policies largely because the socio-political adjustment to economic evolution is too painful, we have got to show sensitivity if we expect them to cooperate in the interest of the system. In return, we should insist that our major partners subordinate—if gradually—their own narrow, near-term interests, as we would be doing, to the goals of openness, fairness, and efficiency, recognizing that our interest in these goals remains strong even if EC and Japanese performance is uneven. The EC presents a special problem, in that discriminatory policies can have a role in achieving the larger goal of enhanced European political cohesion, which we continue to support. But we should not allow the Europeans to use that larger goal as a cover for discrimination that is really commercially motivated. Finally, we should make clear to our partners that, as by-products of recovery, we expect expanded defense efforts and assistance to key Third World areas.

II. Improved Strategic Relationships

Based on the location of our vital interests abroad and the importance of “forward bases” in our global military strategy, our main strategic interests are in Central Europe, Southwest Asia, East Asia, and Central America. Yet key relationships in all these areas are encumbered by serious political problems:

—In Europe, recession, qualms about nuclear weapons, and differences over East–West relations weaken the foundation for defense cooperation and political cohesion.

—In Southwest Asia, intra-regional conflicts and the Arab-Israeli dispute hamper our effort to strengthen and work with key natural allies.

—In East Asia, stagnation or future disruptions in Sino-American relations would relieve pressure on the Soviets; and the same political-economic problems that plague the Atlantic partnership trouble our relationship with Japan.

—In Central America, our ability to work with key natural partners has been damaged by the Falklands crisis⁶ and other, less transient, political differences, including spillover from our quarrels with the Europeans.

The pivotal countries are: Germany, Saudi Arabia, China, Japan and, in this Hemisphere, Brazil, Mexico and Venezuela.⁷ These are difficult partners—indeed, “partnership” is too ambitious a concept for the sort of relationship we can expect or want with China. But if Soviet leaders could list the countries whose relationships with us they would most like to see collapse, these would be at or very near the top.

In two cases, China and Saudi Arabia—and, more generally, East and Southwest Asia—relations are impaired by important US political (as distinct from strategic) ties to Taiwan and Israel respectively. Our ability—and, in domestic political terms, freedom of action—to improve relations and cooperation in these two areas depends on success in enhancing the sense of security of Taiwan and Israel:

—In the case of Taiwan, we have China’s commitment to peaceful intentions toward Taiwan, and should now set our sights on the opening of a serious process toward accommodation.⁸

—In the case of Israel, we should aim to keep Egypt out of an Arab military coalition and secure the broadest possible—including Palestinian—acceptance of Israel’s right to exist.

Both problems are, of course, circular. Our handling of arms sales to Taiwan and our ability to bring the Israelis to negotiate in good faith on the autonomy question will, respectively, determine our chances of enhancing Taiwan’s and Israel’s sense of security.

Japan has the economic means and interests to be not simply a regional partner but a global partner. Indeed, a more active Japanese non-security role outside of East Asia would be more acceptable than an expanded security role within East Asia. The constraints and superstitions that apply to Japanese defense capabilities need not limit Japanese resource transfers to front-line states in Southwest Asia, Africa, and Latin America. Indeed, we should not allow our own (not altogether groundless) fears about eventual remilitarization to inhibit our effort to get the Japanese to accept greater responsibilities. As we try to overcome our economic problems with Japan and resume growth, it has to be clear to the Japanese that they must share more of the load for making the Western economic and security system work.

With regard to NATO, economic cooperation and recovery are necessary but insufficient. We must work to restore within German society, on the broadest possible basis, the unambiguous sense of belonging to the West that characterized Adenauer's Germany.⁹ No relationship—between the two governments and between the two peoples—is more in need of attention. The polarization of German politics has become a distinct possibility, what with the left-ward movement of the SPD, which is likely to accelerate once out of power. This is potentially a dangerous development, especially if it produces competition within Germany between extreme views of how that country should provide for its security. As frustrating and distasteful as it may be, US contacts with even a radicalized SPD must be maintained.

The Federal Republic is our natural ally in attempting to resuscitate the economic institutions of the advanced industrialized community and to improve conventional defense of the Central Front; Germans have more incentive and ability to do both than any other partner. Moreover, our reaching out for such a partnership could give Germans a greater sense of responsibility and attachment.

As a nation bound by restraints, the Germans are extraordinarily sensitive to—indeed, transfixed with—whether others are taking their interests into account. Our performance in INF negotiations—which are essentially about the nuclear threat to Germany—means as much, if not more, to Germans as START means to Americans. This will require a genuine effort to produce progress in INF talks. Progress in START but not in INF would remind Germans that those entrusted to take care of German interests tend first to take care of their own.

Finally, while Central America may now rank fourth in our strategic concerns, it could easily become first. A threat on our border, in the form of cancerous instability and/or Soviet foothold, would skew our entire outlook. The key to American military strategy, in the broadest sense, is forward position; this is demanding under the best of conditions, but far more difficult with an Achilles heel. We need partners, and Venezuela and Mexico are the only serious candidates. Yet the Falklands crisis seems to have damaged quite seriously Venezuelan interest in cooperation with us; and the myriad trade and emigration problems bedeviling US-Mexican ties—and Mexico's own serious sickness—make political-security cooperation difficult. The strategic significance of these two countries must enter into all decisions affecting the future of the relationships.

III. Drawing the Third World Closer

Economic recovery in the OECD will help produce economic recovery in the Third World only to the extent that the latter is connected with the former. In the absence of access to Western markets, financing, investment, and aid, the Third World will remain vulnerable to economic disease, political instability, and Soviet exploitation. Conversely, the frequently hostile rhetoric of the NAM should matter little to us if the Third World fundamentally identifies with the West, subscribes to the same principles of international order, and makes economic progress. Indeed, the anti-colonialist glue of the NAM is crumbling, and we can hasten this by expanding West-South cooperation.

Rather than "global negotiations", we and our Western partners should extend an offer to cooperate to ensure that our growth becomes theirs as well.¹⁰ Through such an offer of "global cooperation", we should try to steer West-South trade, technology transfer, banking and investment patterns in a way that will give at least key developing countries a stake in the Western system. Concessional aid should be concentrated in the "poorest" category, where the benefits of expanding, efficient, international markets will be felt less.

West-South economic cooperation is more practical on a regional or bilateral basis than on a global basis. Natural CBI-like groupings can be identified in every continent, and our Western partners could and should take the lead where we can't. As the ASEAN experience shows, supporting regional cooperation has the additional advantage of raising barriers to Soviet influence and intrusion, even if that cooperation is economic and not security-oriented. If relationships with key regional Third World countries can be pursued without our damaging ties to their neighbors, these poles of development, stability, and strength can help toughen the entire Third World structure against Soviet subversion. Brazil, Nigeria, India, Egypt, Kenya and Mexico may not fit the mold of regional policeman, as we hoped Iran would, but their prospects and policies can contribute importantly to regional stability. The key is not to be too explicit about our interest in promoting regional powers—and not to confuse specific bilateral differences with the important structural role these countries can play.

IV. Peaceful Settlement of Disputes

Violence and lawlessness in the international order—whether or not perpetrated by the USSR—are inimical to US interests. There is, of course, no substitute for imaginative, energetic American diplomatic efforts to settle disputes peacefully, or at least to prevent them from being settled non-peacefully. Uniquely qualified to produce results, we should be less timid—without becoming clumsy—about “getting into the middle” of disputes (e.g., in Latin American and the Horn), to go with our efforts underway in Southern Africa and the Middle East.

But in addition, we should try to strengthen the rule of law by supporting, using, and, where need be, reforming international mechanisms which serve the rule of law. The UNSYG, ICJ, and regional peacemaking/peacekeeping mechanism are worth promoting, especially at the expense of the UNSC and UNGA. Of course, our interest in strengthening international mediation and adjudication authority may collide with our interest in keeping ourselves free of such authority, particularly if it can be used by anti-Western elements. Still, on balance, we should be willing to run some risks if the return is an improved ability to settle disputes before they become crises, especially since we have the political power to safeguard our interests from excessive international authority. The US should consider calling for a serious new look at strengthening international security mechanisms.

More generally, instead of casting our rhetoric in terms of the Soviet challenge to US, or even Western, vital interests, we should stress the Soviets’ disregard for a moderate world order and peaceful change. We should stress—and, in general, our policies should reflect:

- the unacceptability of attempting to obtain by force what can’t be obtained peacefully;
- the obligation of states to negotiate over their differences;
- the insistence that agreements be kept;
- the illegality of subversion; and
- self-determination.

Emphasizing these standards—especially if we’re prepared to live by them—can help establish that US foreign policy is based on the same principles of international order that most non-communist countries consider important. Along with expanding our power and convincing others of our will to act, the key to effective leadership is standing for widely shared principles.

It is equally important—politically and strategically—to support peaceful change, in rhetoric and in practice. Attempting to preserve the status quo can weaken the system, create uncontrollable pressures, and permit our adversaries to claim that they are fighting for justice. Similarly, fostering democratic institutions can enhance stability and non-violent change. Indeed, we will usually find that acting in accordance with our values serves equally well our strategic interests, since the kind of order that is hospitable to our values will be hospitable to our interests.

Dealing with the USSR and Its Allies

How we conduct our relations with the USSR and its allies will have a major effect on our ability to strengthen ties with our allies and to draw the Third World closer to us. In managing this crucial relationship, we face two imperatives.

- to maintain and improve our capability to respond to direct or indirect Soviet aggression;
- to establish a credible dialogue with Moscow on certain global trouble spots (e.g., Southern Africa) and arms control.

Both are necessary; an “either/or” approach won’t work. Particularly during this leadership transition period, we need to earn Soviet respect for our capacity to compete for the longer-term, and to demonstrate that we are willing to reach accommodations in our mutual interest in the near-term.

Simultaneously, we should pursue a differentiated policy towards Eastern Europe and towards Soviet clients and proxies in the Third World. Our goal toward Soviet clients should be to increase their foreign policy independence and their domestic democratization. This will require a mix of stick and carrot, with the precise proportions decided in each specific situation. It may well be easier with those countries not contiguous to the Soviet Union to bring about a reduction in ties with Moscow and repudiation of a Soviet-style communist system. Our goal toward Soviet proxies should be to heighten their concern about direct US reactions. We need to decide how best to bring about one or more individual reversals, i.e., whether to target disproportionate resources/assets on a few countries. We should examine the vulnerabilities of each separately.

Throughout, we need to be conscious of the fact that too confrontational a policy towards the Soviet Union will alienate our Allies, just as too accommodationist a policy will disarm them. A balanced approach will avoid talking about sudden collapse and nuclear war, but it will focus on the essentially antagonistic relationship between the closed Soviet system and the open Western system, on the need for prudent measures to bring about more moderate Soviet behavior internally and externally, and on stimulating independence and diversity among its allies. Our Allies and most of the Third World would view this as a sound approach.

Some Differing Thoughts on Our Emerging China Strategy

Agreement on the Joint Communiqué between the United States and China marks the beginning of a new phase in US-China relations.² This will not permit, however, a simple resumption of the US-China relationship as it existed before these negotiations began. In the interim, Chinese policy has undergone significant changes. In the last year Beijing has moved to distance itself from the US, and has become more openly critical of US positions internationally.

Despite the Communiqué (and in some ways because of it) the Taiwan question will continue to be a major irritant in US-China relations. Beijing clearly does not accept our interpretation of the Communiqué, and can be expected to sustain its pressure for an early termination to Taiwan arms sales and for an implicit right to consultation whenever future sales are made.

Under these circumstances, a close alliance or association with the Chinese is likely to be out of reach. It will be important, therefore, that future US initiatives be premised on balance and reciprocity in the relationship. If not, the Chinese may perceive us as suitors and, paradoxically, feel greater liberty to adopt a standoffish posture. We share many of the points of view of EA on this subject. But we favor a more cautious strategy, one which sets very modest expectations for the relationship. We might, for example, 1) pursue a consciously low-key policy, the pace of which is measured by the degree of positive interest which Beijing itself demonstrates in the US relationship; or 2) pursue a more forward-leaning—but still carefully modulated—policy aimed at extending incentives in return for concrete benefits.

I have attached as Tab A a more detailed elaboration of this issue and of possible policy alternatives. After reading it, you may wish to schedule a short discussion with John Holdridge, Jon Howe, Vernon Walters, Larry, Ken³ and myself. Once we adopt a basic style in the new relationship, we will have to live with it for a while.

PLANNING CONSIDERATIONS FOR U.S.-CHINA POLICY

The recent agreement to a joint communique opens the door for the resumption of a more positive U.S.-China relationship. Nevertheless a simple return to the relationship we enjoyed one year ago is improbable. The last year has been a sobering experience in U.S.-China relations. The Chinese have shown themselves to be hard bargainers, with a strong sense of their own interests and how to project them. Those interests often differ from our own. We can expect in the coming year and beyond that the Chinese will continue to take a tough line with the U.S., particularly on Taiwan matters, and will continue to act more from concrete self-interest than from a conceptual commitment to the benefits of cooperation.

Momentum to Where?

We will need to be no less hard-headed. If, as EA has pointed out, it is important to establish a sense of “momentum” and “steady growth” in the relationship, it will be no less important to identify from an early point the limits and the potential of that relationship and the goal that we want to establish momentum toward. This kind of analysis will be necessary if we are to properly determine the extent and limits of the investment in our Chinese ties.

In partial answer to that question, I believe that China—because of its size, location, and anti-Soviet orientation—offers a range of potential strategic benefits, both globally and regionally. It is also in our interest to encourage a stable China, constructively tied to the West and to the world community, since a hostile or instable China could move closer toward the USSR, and could threaten U.S. friends and interests in Asia.

We must, nevertheless, be cautious in our evaluation of the possible extent of "strategic cooperation" with the PRC. Already the basis for strategic cooperation has begun to contract. This is evidenced in part by the significantly curtailed nature of the strategic portion of our joint communique, and by the Chinese desire during the later stages of the negotiations to further restrict or to eliminate it entirely. Beijing has recently moved to publicly distance itself from the U.S., and has become more openly critical of U.S. positions internationally. In part, this was a reaction to the uncertainty of the Taiwan arms negotiations. More broadly, though, the PRC now appears to be moving away from a perceived partnership with the U.S. against the USSR, and toward a position less identified with uncompromising anti-Sovietism. Efforts are accelerating to cultivate Third World nations and even radical states close to the Soviets. While near-term detente between Beijing and Moscow remains unlikely, and while China will continue to oppose Soviet "hegemonism," some relaxation of Sino-Soviet relations in the political, cultural and economic fields has already begun and can be expected to continue. Communist Party Chairman Hu Yaobang's recent speech to the Twelfth Party Congress stands as only the latest indicator of the changing nature of the U.S.-China relationship.⁵ Based on this realignment, we can expect that Beijing will seek to avoid the appearance of either alliance or alignment with the United States, and while continuing to pursue policies "parallel" to our own, will in the future follow an increasingly independent policy.

A Modulated Policy

Overall, these developments indicate the need for a U.S. policy which is positive and cordial, but less expensive and more at arm's length than was once anticipated. We should continue to encourage the pursuit and coordination of parallel interests wherever possible, but with a more limited set of expectations than in the past regarding the prospects for true cooperation. In particular, much greater attention must be given to the need to modulate future U.S. initiatives to the constructiveness of actual Chinese behavior. This will be necessary to ensure a proper balance in the relationship, and to avoid a situation in which the U.S. is cast in the role of suitor. The perception of a United States which is overly anxious to build a close relationship could serve to encourage those in the PRC who are inclined to leverage us on issues where differences still remain, and, paradoxically, those inclined to distance themselves from us in order to maintain an independent image. This suggests, among other things, the need to maintain appropriate restraint on the pacing and timing of future initiatives toward Beijing, including near-term high-level visits.

In this context, we need to ask not only how we can advance our China relationship by actions designed to meet Chinese demands or expectations, but also what concretely we ourselves want or expect to gain from the Chinese. While, as some have suggested, it may be desirable to loosen controls on technology exports to the PRC or to go forward in the area of peaceful nuclear cooperation (an enhanced focus on economic development, China's principal national objective, may in fact be our best strategy for the moment), these actions should not occur in a vacuum. Instead they should be related to a clearly demonstrated Chinese desire for constructive cooperation. We should not give something for nothing. As outlined below, this could be measured by concrete indicia. In addition, we should also consider the possible negative sanctions available (such as the withholding of technology) should Beijing again threaten a retrogression or should Chinese policies turn in a direction decidedly hostile to U.S. interests.

Pressure and Firmness on Taiwan

We should, in addition, avoid focusing excessive attention on those areas where the U.S. and the PRC continue to disagree. Such a focus would detract from our objective of rebuilding a positive, broad-based relationship. The immediate issue remains Taiwan. Despite the communique, the Chinese have told us directly they do not consider this the end of the issue, and that they reserve the right to scrutinize our future sales. Since our agreement to the communique, we have continued to be pressured on this score. According to the Chinese Foreign Ministry, the communique "only marks a beginning of the settlement of this issue," and a through resolution "is indispensable to the maintenance and development of Sino-U.S. relations." We have been told privately that Beijing expects that reductions in arms sales to Taiwan will not be "dollar-a-year," but rather will be rapid and will lead to an early termination. We are currently being pressed for data on past sales levels, and it is clear that Beijing will attempt to use language in paragraph 9 of the communique calling for "appropriate consultations" to support their claim to a voice in our future arms decisions. China has publicly rejected the fundamental linkage between our willingness to reduce future sales and the PRC's commitment to a peaceful resolution of the issue (Xinhua, August 29). Beijing has also continued to heavily criticize the Taiwan Relations Act, suggesting it will remain a specific target of Chinese policy. An authoritative editorial in the People's Daily has predicted that the

U.S.-China relationship will face a crisis if U.S. policymakers insist on adhering to this “internal law.”⁶

I do not believe these objections to U.S. policy are “pro forma.” Instead, it seems clear that even if these statements are made to some extent for internal consumption, they are no less indicative of the true Chinese position. While some are hopeful that the communique will allow us to put the Taiwan issue on the “back burner” for one or more years, if experience is any indication our respite will be short. Under these circumstances, we must be prepared to be very firm in adhering to the President’s desire to sell Taiwan the arms it needs for its legitimate self-defense, and must strongly resist pressure from Beijing to explicitly or implicitly accept a Chinese role in determining the pace of our movement on this score. Such pressure should be met, I suggest, not with discussion of the merits of proposed arms sales, but rather should be deflected by general reassurances of our commitment to the terms of the communique as we interpret it.

Implications

The analysis above suggests that the United States might move in a number of directions.

(a) Pursue a positive but low-keyed relationship. The U.S. can go forward with its relationship with China on a reserved basis, based on the judgment that current Chinese attitudes may restrain for the foreseeable future the extent of Sino-American cooperation. Under this strategy, U.S. initiatives should be undertaken at a measured pace related directly to the degree of reciprocity demonstrated by the Chinese. Specific steps might include initial restraint in near-term high-level visits (e.g., postponement of some high-level visits to Beijing until early 1983, or waiting for Zhao Ziyang to visit Washington before sending a delegation of comparable seniority), and shifting the primary focus of the relationship, if this should be necessary, in the direction of economic and commercial relations (e.g., enhanced technology transfer and credit extension).

(b) Expand the relationship, if possible, as a means toward achieving specific objectives. Pursue a more aggressive policy, aimed at achieving concrete benefits. Under this approach, we would seek to move the Chinese forward by offering up special incentives that may be of interest. Should Beijing prove unwilling to offer concrete, reciprocal benefits, we would need to fall back to a more restrained policy. Specific inducements the United States could offer might include stepped up technology transfer and the sale of selected defensive arms (consistent with the interests of China's non-communist neighbors). Specific objectives the United States might hope to pursue (and concrete measures of Chinese interest in constructive cooperation) could include Chinese support or neutrality on third world issues in which we have an interest, a forthcoming position on Southwest Asian problems (such as support for Pakistan), aid to the non-communist resistance in Kampuchea, access to military facilities in China, port calls for US naval vessels, and restraint of Chinese criticism on Taiwan. Though far from certain, this approach could have the added benefit of drawing the Chinese closer to the U.S. strategic network.

In either event, S/P does not recommend an immediate acceleration of the China relationship in the absence of more clearly articulated planning for long-term strategy toward both China and Taiwan.

119. Briefing Memorandum From the Director of the Policy Planning Staff (Wolfowitz) to Secretary of State Shultz¹

Washington, September 24, 1982

SUBJECT

Mid-Term Planning Exercise

Ed Meese hopes to meet with you soon to discuss the President's foreign policy objectives for the last two years of the first term. Ed has noted the importance of this mid-term planning process for "presidential policy guidance as we prepare the FY 1982 budget, the State of the Union and the other messages the President will send to the Congress in early 1983".

¹ Source: Department of State, Executive Secretariat, S/P Records, Memoranda and Correspondence from the Director of the Policy Planning Staff to the Secretary and Other Seventh Floor Principals: Lot 89D149, S/P Chrons PW Chrons to Secy SEP 1982. Limited Official Use. Drafted by Kaplan; cleared by Gompert. Kaplan initialed for Gompert. Bremer initialed the memorandum at the top and wrote "10/12." In a September 18 note to Wolfowitz, Adams requested that he prepare "a briefing paper with talking points" for Shultz. (Ibid.) Wolfowitz sent the memorandum to Shultz under a September 24 covering note, indicating that it was "the briefing memorandum requested for your meeting with Ed Meese on mid-term foreign policy planning." He continued, "Since your meeting with Ed is not for another month (October 20), you will want to regard this as a first cut. After the UNGA, and once you have a better idea of what he has in mind, you may wish us to provide other materials or to hold a meeting to discuss the subject." No record of Shultz's meeting with Meese has been found.

Meese's memo, which was sent to all Cabinet officers, is at Tab A.² We have provided you at Tab B with summary of the information he requested on the President's foreign policy objectives, accomplishments and remaining issues. The paper at Tab C covers major resource implications. You may wish to leave Tabs B and C with Ed.

Themes for Meeting with Ed Meese

- The President has moved effectively to set a new direction in US foreign policy: more vigorous defense of US ideals and interests and more realistic approach to foreign policy problems.

- As a result, we have made a good beginning toward reasserting US leadership and recapturing US credibility in world affairs. This is a long term effort and we must persevere.

- To this end, it is essential that we sustain efforts to restore American military strength. That may prove increasingly difficult in view of the budgetary squeeze, the growing peace movement and rising political pressures to shift resources from defense to domestic programs.

- We therefore should continue to meet the peace issue head on. Peace must be our issue. The President's speeches on INF, START and MBFR,³ and the dramatic proposals he announced for each negotiation, have helped unite the alliance on arms control and frustrate the Soviets. We can maintain this political high ground by sticking to the President's clear criterion of "militarily significant reductions to equal and verifiable levels," while adjusting our tactics as needed.

- US leadership and credibility also require close cooperation with our European allies. This means more than the pipeline. We currently have a number of policy differences—on East-West relations, strengthening NATO's conventional defense, economic policy and approaches toward third world economics and crisis spots. Government changes in Germany, Denmark and Holland, together with policy changes in France, may offer opportunities to forge a stronger allied consensus.

- In Asia our alliances (Japan, Korea, the Philippines, ANZUS) and relations with friendly countries (ASEAN) are in good shape, though

² Attached but not printed is Meese's September 16 memorandum to multiple agency heads, in which he stated: "It is important that we move forward promptly on the mid-term planning exercise. My office will contact yours to arrange a mutually convenient time when we can meet to discuss the President's objectives in the area covered by your department or agency."

the economic relationship with Japan continues to be troublesome. We have avoided a blow-up with the PRC over military sales to Taiwan but the Chinese are moving toward a more (at least publicly) even-handed approach to Washington and Moscow. A presidential trip to the Pacific could be very helpful in emphasizing our growing interests in that region.

- As to regional hot spots, we need to counter adventurism by the USSR and its proxies, while seizing opportunities to play the role of peacemaker.

- No area will involve more of our national interests over the next two years than the Mideast, where we must press ahead with the President's peace plan,⁴ while managing the region's seemingly daily crises in Lebanon. We also must persist in our complementary Southwest Asia security strategy.

- Beyond the Mideast, crisis management now involves Central America, Poland, Afghanistan, Kampuchea and Libya. Crises also entail opportunities: we are making progress toward a Namibia peace settlement in Southern Africa.

- Nuclear non-proliferation is a fundamental element of our peace policy. We will focus on strengthening international safeguards and will concentrate quiet but vigorous non-proliferation efforts on sensitive countries and regions. We will also seek ways to bring new exporters like the PRC into line with existing practices. We must show that unilateral nuclear trade restraints by the U.S. do not by themselves lead to a sound international non-proliferation regime.

- Much of these efforts will depend on the success of the President's domestic economic program. The drop in inflation and interest rates is encouraging. Continued progress is essential if we are to help revive the sick world economy which is plagued by mounting debt, growing protectionism and deepening mistrust between developed and developing countries. The November GATT Ministerial presents an early opportunity to deal with sensitive trade issues.

- The President's reassertion of US leadership urgently requires resources to finance our political goals, just as a stronger military posture requires increased defense budgets. We simply cannot run a first-class foreign policy with second class resources. The President will need to get involved to assure US congressional and public support for these resources. MID-TERM PLANNING EXERCISE SUMMARY OF
INFORMATION ON U.S. FOREIGN POLICY

1. President's Objectives

- a. Reassert US leadership and recapture global credibility.
- b. Restore American military strength and take command of peace issue.
- c. Counter adventurism by USSR and its proxies.
- d. Strengthen Atlantic and Pacific alliances and friendships with key Third World countries.
- e. Bolster international (especially Western) cooperation on world economic problems.
- f. Conclude peaceful settlements in Mideast and southern Africa.

2. Accomplishments to Date

- a. Strengthening US defense posture and international leadership.
- b. Proposed comprehensive arms control program concerning START, INF and MBFR, generating Allied support for US security policies.
- c. Established multinational forces, facilitating Israeli withdrawal from Sinai and PLO withdrawal from Beirut, and Israeli departure from Beirut.
- d. Presented dramatic Reagan peace plan for Mideast.
- e. Achieved progress toward Namibia settlement.
- f. Fostered free elections in El Salvador and stymied guerrilla take-over there.
- g. Diplomatic resolution of Taiwan arms issue.

3. Key Remaining Issues

- a. Sustain congressional/public support for strengthening the US defense posture.
- b. Maintain support for US arms control program, thereby facilitating INF deployments and Western conventional defense improvements.

⁵No classification marking.

- c. Strengthen Atlantic alliance and NATO solidarity, and seek resolution of pipeline dispute in a way that meets President's objectives.
- d. Press ahead on Reagan Mideast proposals and on withdrawal of all foreign forces from Lebanon.
- e. Conclude Namibia agreement involving Cuban withdrawal from Angola.
- f. Counter Soviet/proxy adventurism in Central America and regional hot spots.
- g. Strengthen international cooperation on world economic problems, including global debt and trade issues.
- h. Build support for our nuclear non-proliferation policy, which emphasizes strengthened international safeguards and which focuses on countries and regions of real proliferation risk.

MAJOR RESOURCE IMPLICATIONS

Without adequate foreign assistance funding it will be impossible to achieve the President's foreign policy objectives. Reduction of the foreign aid program will force us to make decisions on which objectives to go forward on and which to neglect, since the notion of cutting everyone a little bit is not viable.

The Fiscal 1984 foreign assistance budget I am proposing will require approximately $14.2 billion. This budget includes no new policy initiatives or programs; rather it is the bare bones amount necessary to implement foreign policy objectives articulated during the President's first two years in office. Major Strategic objectives include:

Middle East Peace—U.S. policy in the Middle East region is based on two mutually reinforcing goals: 1) the search for a just and lasting peace among all of the states in the area and 2) the urgent requirement that our friends in the region be able to assure their security against threats from the outside and from the pressures of Soviet surrogates and radical forces within the region. Our $4.7 billion FY 1984 assistance program is needed to promote economic and political stability, support development efforts, and to demonstrate the U.S. commitment to the Middle East peace process.

⁶Confidential. Drafted by Feldstein on September 24.

European Strategic—The $1.7 billion request for FY 1984 will further U.S. policy in Europe by assisting NATO nations in acquiring the material and training needed to meet their NATO commitments. Assistance to this region supports our common defense against threats to the alliance and against challenges to our common interests beyond the geographic bounds of the alliance.

Caribbean Basin—The $960 million U.S. assistance programs in FY 1984 is designed to counter the challenge posed by attempted exploitation of socio-economic problems and military vulnerabilities. The assistance program will complement trade and investment initiatives which together will promote economic development, address underlying causes of socio-political instability and seek to re-establish security within the region as a whole.

Southwest Asia/Persian Gulf—Southwest Asia remains a critical source of energy for the free world and U.S. policy is to ensure our continued access to and presence in the region in time of crisis. Many of the countries in the area stretching from Pakistan to Morocco are economically troubled. Regional animosity and the potential for East-West conflict make Southwest Asia a potential flash-point that would have consequences far beyond the immediate area. Our $1.5 billion assistance program will help facilitate their economic development and military preparedness essential to implement U.S. foreign policy and national security objectives in the region.

Pacific—The Pacific region is of historic political, strategic and economic importance to the U.S. We have important treaty relationships with several countries in the region, including in the Philippines, where our bases support U.S. defense objectives in Southwest Asia. Our economic and commercial interests throughout the region are of increasing importance and we and our partners, like Japan, depend on keeping open the sea lanes connecting the Indian and Pacific Oceans. An assistance program of $711 million is necessary to protect our objectives here in FY 1984.

Southern Africa—Our policy in southern Africa is designed to advance the peace process in Namibia, ensure continued Western access to sources of key strategic minerals, and to support the development process from Zaire to the Cape. In Zaire we and our allies are working together with the multilateral agencies to stabilize and protect one of the most economically valuable and strategic positions in Africa. Our willingness to provide $265 million in FY 1984 for the front-line states in southern Africa validates our political participation in the peace process. The alternative—a new escalation of conflict—would provide significant new opportunities for the Cubans and Soviets.

120. Address by Secretary of State Shultz Before the United Nations General Assembly¹

New York, September 30, 1982

U.S. Foreign Policy: Realism and Progress

I begin by paying tribute to our new Secretary General, who has brought great distinction to the office during his brief tenure. Dag Hammarskjöld once told the General Assembly that “independence, impartiality, objectivity—they all describe essential aspects of what, without exception, must be in the attitude of the Secretary General.” Javier Perez de Cuellar, a man of the Third World and, I am proud to note, of the New World as well, has already demonstrated his strict adherence to this most exacting standard. In so doing, he has earned the esteem of my government and the gratitude of all who believe in the purposes of the charter.

I congratulate, as well, Mr. Hollai [Imre Hollai, Deputy Foreign Minister] of Hungary upon his election as President of the 37th Session of the General Assembly.

As I stand before you today, I cannot help but reflect on my relation to this city and to this hall. I was born about 4 miles from here. I was reared and educated not far away, just across the Hudson River. And I took a tour through this building just after it opened in 1952 marveling at the reality of a temple erected in the hope, at least, of abolishing war.

When I took that tour back in the early fifties, there was great public interest in what was called “the Meditation Room.” I understand the room is still here. But in the years since then, this institution has become more famous for talk than for meditation. This hall has heard great ideas eloquently expressed. It has also heard doubletalk, platitudes, and ringing protestations of innocence—all too often aimed at camouflaging outrageous and inhuman acts.

But we must not ridicule words. I believe that the greatest advance in human history was not the wheel, the use of electricity, or the internal

(Department of State, Central Foreign Policy File, Electronic Telegrams, D820506–1039) All brackets are in the original. Shultz, in characterizing the address, wrote in his memoir that he had “summed up what little wisdom I picked up from the incredible events of August and September. We would start from realism. We would act from strength, both in power and purpose. We would stress the essential need to generate consent, build agreement, and negotiate on key issues. We would conduct ourselves in the belief that progress was possible, even though the road to its achievement was long and hard. I thought these points were straightforward and obvious benchmarks for our foreign policy in the 1980s. They proved to be anything but easy to implement.” (Shultz, Turmoil and Triumph, pp. 111–112) combustion engine. Indispensable to progress as these have been, our most remarkable achievement was the slow, clumsy but triumphant creation of language. It is words that released our ancestors from the prison of the solitary. Words gave us the means to transmit to our children and the future the crowning jewel of human existence: knowledge. The code of Hammurabi, the Bible, the analects of Confucius, the teachings of the Buddha, the Koran, the insights of Shakespeare, the creed of Mahatma Gandhi or Martin Luther King—all these are arrangements of words.

Is it not profoundly revealing that the first victims of tyrants are—words? No people better know the meaning of freedom than those who have been arrested, beaten, imprisoned, or exiled because of what they said. A single man speaking out—a Lech Walesa for example—is more dangerous than an armored division.

All of us here—whether we arrived after a short 1-hour flight, as I did, or came from the other side of the globe, as many of you did—enter this auditorium for one main purpose: to talk about what our governments see as the problems ahead and how they should be solved. On one point, at least, we can all agree: The problems are many and difficult. I shall not try, in the minutes allotted me, to deal with each—or even most—of those issues in detail. Instead, I want to give you some sense of the principles and general approach the United States will take toward our common problems.

Americans are, by history and by inclination, a practical and pragmatic people—yet a people with a vision. It is the vision—usually simple and sometimes naive—that has so often led us to dare and to achieve. President Reagan’s approach to foreign policy is grounded squarely on standards drawn from the pragmatic American experience. As De Tocqueville pointed out, “To achieve its objective, America relies on personal interest, and gives full reign to the strength and reason of the individual.” That is as true now as when it was said 150 years ago. Our principal instrument, now as then, is freedom. Our adversaries are the oppressors, the totalitarians, the tacticians of fear and pressure.

On this foundation, President Reagan’s ideas and the structure of his foreign policy are so straightforward that those of us enmeshed in day-to-day details may easily lose sight of them. The President never does; he consistently brings us back to fundamentals. Today, I will talk about those fundamentals. They consist of four ideas that guide our actions.

- We will start from realism.
- We will act from strength, both in power and purpose.
- We will stress the indispensable need to generate consent, build agreements, and negotiate on key issues.

- We will conduct ourselves in the belief that progress is possible, even though the road to achievement is long and hard.

Reality

If we are to change the world we must first understand it. We must face reality—with all its anguish and all its opportunities. Our era needs those who, as Pericles said, have the clearest vision of what is before them, glory and danger alike, and, notwithstanding, go out to meet it.

Reality is not an illusion nor a sleight of hand, though many would have us believe otherwise. The enormous, grinding machinery of Soviet propaganda daily seeks to distort reality, to bend truth for its own purposes. Our world is occupied by far too many governments which seek to conceal truth from their own people. They wish to imprison reality by controlling what can be read or spoken or heard. They would have us believe that black is white and up is down.

Much of present-day reality is unpleasant. To describe conditions as we see them, as I do today and as President Reagan has over the course of his presidency, is not to seek confrontation. Far from it. Our purpose is to avoid misunderstanding and to create the necessary pre-conditions for change. And so, when we see aggression, we will call it aggression. When we see subversion, we will call it subversion. When we see repression, we will call it repression.

- Events in Poland, for example, cannot be ignored or explained away. The Polish people want to be their own master. Years of systematic tyranny could not repress this desire, and neither will martial law. But in Poland today, truth must hide in corners.

- Nor can we simply turn our heads and look the other way as Soviet divisions brutalize an entire population in Afghanistan. The resistance of the Afghan people is a valiant saga of our times. We demean that valor if we do not recognize its source.

- And Soviet surrogates intervene in many countries, creating a new era of colonialism at the moment in history when peoples around the globe had lifted that burden from their backs.

- Nor will we shy away from speaking of other problems affecting the free and developing worlds. Much of the developing world is threatened by a crisis of confidence in financial institutions and the stultifying effects of state-controlled economies. The naturally vibrant economies of many Western nations and trade between the world's major trading partners are threatened by recession and rising protectionism. The great alliances that shore up world stability and growth—our hemispheric partnership and NATO, and the Western and Japanese industrial democracies—are challenged by new as well as chronic strains.

- Finally, the shadow of war still darkens the future of us all. There is no ultimate safety in a nuclear balance of terror constantly contested. There is no peace of mind at a time when increasing numbers of nations appear willing to launch their armies into battles for causes which seem local but have ramifications for regional and even global harmony.

The list of troubles is long; the danger of despair great. But there is another side to the present reality; it is a reality of hope. We are living in a fantastic time of opportunity.

Historians in the future will surely marvel over the accomplishments achieved by human beings in the last half of this century. We have expanded the frontiers of thought—in science, biology, and engineering; in painting, music, and mathematics; in technology and architecture—far beyond the point anyone could have dared predict, much less hoped for. We know much today about the oceans and forests and the geological strata that lock in the story of our past. We know more about a baby—or the brain—than was accumulated in 10 millenia before our time. We are learning to produce food for all of us; we are no longer helpless before the threat of disease; we explore our universe as a matter of course. We are confronting the nature of nature itself. The opportunities are grand. This, too, is a clear reality.

Thus, realism shows us a world deeply troubled, yet with reason for hope. There is one necessary condition: The only way we can enhance and amplify the human potential is by preserving, defending, and extending those most precious of conditions—freedom and peace.

Strength

America's yearning for peace does not lead us to be hesitant in developing our strength or in using it when necessary. Indeed, clarity about the magnitude of the problems we face leads inevitably to a realistic appreciation of the importance of American strength. The strength of the free world imposes restraint, invites accommodation, and reassures those who would share in the creative work that is the wonderful consequence of liberty.

Strength means military forces to insure that no other nation can threaten us, our interests, or our friends. But when I speak of strength, I do not mean military power alone. To Americans, strength derives as well from a solid economic base and social vitality at home and with our partners. And, most fundamentally, the true wellspring of strength lies in America's moral commitment.

The bulwark of America's strength is military power for peace. The American people have never accepted weakness, nor hesitancy, nor abdication. We will not put our destiny into the hands of the ruthless. Americans today are emphatically united on the necessity of a strong defense. This year's defense budget² will insure that the United States will help its friends and allies defend themselves—to make sure that peace is seen clearly by all to be the only feasible course in world affairs.

Along with military readiness and capability must come the willingness to employ it in the cause of peace, justice, and security. Today in Beirut the U.S. Marines—together with our allies Italy and France—are helping the Lebanese Government and Armed Forces assure the safety of the peoples of that tormented capital. Our Marines represent an extension of American power, not for war but to secure the peace. They are there to speed the moment when all foreign forces depart from Lebanon. There must be early agreement on a timetable for the full application of Lebanon's independence, sovereignty, and territorial integrity. Lebanon deserves the world's help—to secure peace and to rebuild a thriving society.

America will continue to use its strength with prudence, firmness, and balance. We intend to command the respect of adversaries and to deserve the confidence of allies and partners.

The engine of America's strength is a sound economy. In a time of recession, industrialized and less developed nations alike are bedeviled by excessive inflation, restricted markets, unused capacity, stagnating trade, growing pressure for protectionism, and the most potent enemy of expansion—pervasive uncertainty.

The United States, with its vast human and scientific resources, can survive an era of economic strife and decay. But our moral commitment and our self-interest require us to use our technological and productive abilities to build lasting prosperity at home and to contribute to a sound economic situation abroad.

President Reagan has instituted a bold program to get the American economy moving. Our rate of inflation is down markedly, and we will keep it down. This will add stability to the value of the dollar and give greater confidence to international financial markets.

The recent drop in U.S. interest rates will stimulate new investments within and beyond our shores. Conservation through market pricing of energy has reduced U.S. demand for world energy supplies. We are putting the recession behind us. A growing and open American economy will provide new markets for goods and services produced elsewhere and new opportunities for foreign investment. Just as we have a stake in worldwide recovery, others will prosper as our recovery develops.

² The President transmitted the FY 1983 budget, including proposed defense expenditures, to Congress on February 8. For his message to Congress, see Public Papers: Reagan, 1982, Book I, pp. 121–134. On August 18, Congress cleared the Department of Defense Authorization Act for 1983 (S.2248; P.L. 97–252; 96 Stat. 718), which the President signed into law on September 8. (Congress and the Nation, vol. VI, 1981–1984, p. 217)

For wider prosperity to take hold, we must cooperatively attend these international issues.

- The lure of protectionist trade policies must be resisted—whether in the form of overt import restrictions and export subsidies or by more subtle domestic programs. These can only distort world trade and impair growth everywhere. Let us determine to make the November ministerial meeting of the GATT [General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade] a time to stem these protectionist pressures and reinvigorate positive efforts for a more open trading system.

- The implications of the external debt of many nations must be understood. Immediate debt problems are manageable if we use good sense and avoid destabilizing actions. But the magnitude of external debt will almost inevitably reduce resources available for future lending for development purposes. Economic adjustment is imperative. The International Monetary Fund can provide critical help and guidance in any country's efforts to smooth the adjustment process. The new borrowing arrangement proposed by the United States can be crucial to this effort.

- And the necessity of reducing government interference in the market must be recognized. Every nation has the right to organize society as its inhabitants wish, but economic facts cannot be ignored. Those facts clearly demonstrate that the world's command economies have failed abysmally to meet the needs of their peoples. The newly prosperous industrialized nations are those with the most free and open markets.

The bedrock of our strength is our moral and spiritual character. The sources of true strength lie deeper than economic or military power—in the dedication of a free people which knows its responsibility. America's institutions are those of freedom accessible to every person and of government as the accountable servant of the people. Equal opportunity; due process of law; open trial by jury; freedom of belief, speech, and assembly—our Bill of Rights, our guarantees of liberty and limited government—were hammered out in centuries of ordeal. Because we care about these human values for ourselves, so must we then be concerned, and legitimately so, with abuses of freedom, justice, and humanitarian principles beyond our borders. This is why we will speak and act for prisoners of conscience, against terrorism, and against the brutal silencing of the Soviet Helsinki Watch Committee.³ This is why we are anxious to participate in periodic reviews of the human rights performance of ourselves as well as others. We welcome scrutiny of our own system. We are not perfect, and we know it, but we have nothing to hide.

Our belief in liberty guides our policies here in the United Nations as elsewhere. Therefore, in this forum the United States will continue to insist upon fairness, balance, and truth. We take the debate on human rights seriously. We insist upon honesty in the use of language; we will point out inconsistencies, double standards, and lies. We will not compromise our commitment to truth.

Readiness To Solve Problems

The world has work to do for the realists, the pragmatists, and the free. With a clear understanding of the troubled circumstances of the hour and with a strengthened ability to act, we need, as well, the vision to see beyond the immediate present.

All of us here represent nations which must understand and accept the imperative of fair engagement on the issues before us and, beyond that, of common effort toward shared goals. Whether we are seeking to bring peace to regional conflict or a resolution of commercial differences, the time of imposed solutions has passed. Conquest, pressure, acquiescence under duress were common in decades not long past, but not today. Not everybody who wants his concerns addressed will find us automatically receptive. But when negotiations are in order, America is prepared to go to work on the global agenda and to do so in a way that all may emerge better off and more secure than before.

We manage our problems more intelligently, and with greater mutual understanding, when we can bring ourselves to recognize them as expressions of mankind's basic dilemma. We are seldom confronted with simple issues of right and wrong, between good and evil. Only those who do not bear the direct burden of responsibility for decision and action can indulge themselves in the denial of that reality. The task of statesmanship is to mediate between two—or several—causes, each of which often has a legitimate claim.

It is on this foundation that the United States stands ready to try to solve the problems of our time—to overcome chaos, deprivation, and the heightened dangers of an era in which ideas and cultures too often tend to clash and technologies threaten to outpace our institutions of control.

We are engaged in negotiations and efforts to find answers to issues affecting every part of the globe and every aspect of our lives upon it.

The Middle East. The agony of the Middle East now exceeds the ability of news bulletins or speeches to express; it is a searing wound on our consciousness. The region is in constant ferment. Unrest flares into violence, terror, insurrection, and civil strife. War follows war. It is clear to everyone in this hall that international peace, security, and cooperative progress cannot be truly achieved until this terrible regional conflict is settled.

All of us have witnessed in the past several months a graphic reminder of the need for practical peace negotiations in the Middle East. Of the nations in the world which need and deserve peace, Israel surely holds a preeminent place. Of the peoples of the world who need and deserve a place with which they can truly identify, the Palestinian claim is undeniable.

But Israel can only have permanent peace in a context in which the Palestinian people also realize their legitimate rights. Similarly, the Palestinian people will be able to achieve their legitimate rights only in a context which gives to Israel what it so clearly has a right to demand—to exist, and to exist in peace and security.

This most complex of international conflicts cannot be resolved by force. Neither the might of armies nor the violence of terrorists can succeed in imposing the will of the strong upon the weak. Nor can it be settled simply by the rhetoric of even the most carefully worded document. It can only be resolved through the give and take of direct negotiations leading to the establishment of practical arrangements on the ground.

In other words, it can only be resolved through hard work. For those who believe that there is no contradiction between permanent peace for Israel and the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people—and for those who believe that both are essential for peace and that neither can be achieved without the other—the task can truly be a labor of love.

On September 1, President Reagan challenged the parties to the Arab-Israeli conflict to make a fresh start on the road to peace in the Middle East.⁴ The Camp David agreements, resting squarely on U.N. Security Council Resolution 242,⁵ with its formula of peace for territory, remain available to those who would accept the challenge to make this journey with us. The road will not be easy but, in his statement, President Reagan made a number of proposals which, for those who are willing to join the effort, make the journey safer and easier. I call on all concerned to accept President Reagan's challenge and hasten the realization of true peace in the Middle East.

Arms Control. In addition to the imperative need to resolve regional problems, there is an equally significant global imperative: to halt, and reverse, the global arms buildup. As an American, I am aware that arms control and disarmament are a special responsibility of the world's most powerful nations—the United States and the Soviet Union. And as an American, I can report that we are fulfilling our responsibility to seek to limit and reduce conventional and nuclear arms to the lowest possible levels.

With this goal in mind, President Reagan has initiated a comprehensive program for negotiated arms reductions. In central Europe, the most heavily armed region on this planet, the Western allies are seeking substantial reductions in NATO and Warsaw Pact troops to equal levels. To achieve this goal, we have recently introduced a new proposal designed to revitalize the talks in Vienna on mutual and balanced reductions in military manpower.⁶

In the area of strategic arms, the United States has also taken the initiative by calling for a one-third reduction in the number of nuclear warheads that American and Soviet ballistic missiles can deliver.⁷ And in the talks in Geneva on intermediate-range nuclear forces, the United States has gone even further, by asking the Soviet Union to agree to a bold proposal for eliminating an entire category of weapons from the arsenals of the two sides.

But as important as these negotiations are, the problem of arms control cannot be left to the two superpowers. The threat of nuclear proliferation extends to every region in the world and demands the attention and energy of every government. This is not solely, or even primarily, a concern of the superpowers. The non-nuclear countries will not be safer if nuclear intimidation is added to already deadly regional conflicts. The developing nations will not be more prosperous if scarce resources and scientific talent are diverted to nuclear weapons and delivery systems.

Unfortunately, as the task becomes more important, it also becomes more difficult. Greater quantities of dangerous materials are produced, and new suppliers emerge who lack a clear commitment to nonproliferation. But the technology that helped to create the problems can supply answers as well. Vigorous action to strengthen the barriers to aggression and to resolve disputes peacefully can remove the insecurities that are the root of the problem. The United States, for its part, will work to tighten export controls, to promote broader acceptance of safeguards, to urge meaningful actions when agreements are violated, and to strengthen the International Atomic Energy Agency. As our action last week in Vienna should make clear, we will not accept attempts to politicize—and, therefore, emasculate—such vital institutions.⁸

Progress

Perhaps the most common phrase spoken by the American people in our more than two centuries of national life has been: “You can’t stop progress.” Our people have always been imbued with the conviction that the future of a free people would be good.

America continues to offer that vision to the world. With that vision and with the freedom to act creatively, there is nothing that people of goodwill need fear.

I am not here to assert, however, that the way is easy, quick, or that the future is bound to be bright. There is a poem by Carl Sandburg in which a traveler asks the sphinx to speak and reveal the distilled wisdom of all the ages. The sphinx does speak. Its words are: “Don’t expect too much.”⁹

That is good counsel for all of us here. It does not mean that great accomplishments are beyond our reach. We can help shape more constructive international relations and give our children a better chance at life. It does mean, however, that risk, pain, expense, and above all endurance are needed to bring those achievements into our grasp.

We must recognize the complex and vexing character of this world. We should not indulge ourselves in fantasies of perfection or unfulfillable plans or solutions gained by pressure. It is the responsibility of leaders not to feed the growing appetite for easy promises and grand assurances. The plain truth is this: We face the prospect of all too few decisive or dramatic breakthroughs; we face the necessity of dedicating our energies and creativity to a protracted struggle toward eventual success.

Conclusion

That is the approach of my country—because we see not only the necessity, but the possibility, of making important progress on a broad front.

- Despite deep-seated differences between us and the Soviet Union, negotiators of both sides are now at work in a serious, business-like effort at arms control.

- President Reagan has issued an important call for an international conference on military expenditure.¹⁰ The achievement of a common system for accounting and reporting is the prerequisite for subsequent agreement to limit or curtail defense budgets.

- The Caribbean Basin initiative establishes the crucial bond between economic development and economic freedom. It can be a model for fair and productive cooperation between economies vastly different in size and character.

- And the diplomatic way is open to build stability and progress in southern Africa through independence for Namibia under internationally acceptable terms.

Realism and a readiness to work long and hard for fair and freely agreed solutions—that is our recipe for optimism. That is the message and the offer which my government brings to you today.

I began my remarks here today with an informal personal word. Let me end in the same spirit. We must be determined and confident. We must be prepared for trouble but always optimistic. In this way the vast bounties produced by the human mind and imagination can be shared by all the races and nations we represent here in this hall.

A predecessor of mine as Secretary of State, whose portrait hangs in my office, conveyed the essence of America's approach to the world's dangers and dilemmas. He said we would act with "a stout heart and a clear conscience, and never despair."

That is what John Quincy Adams said nearly a century and a half ago. I give you my personal pledge today that we will continue in that spirit, with that determination, and with that confidence in the future.

121. Memorandum From Steven Sestanovich of the Policy Planning Staff to the Director of the Policy Planning Staff (Wolfowitz)¹

Washington, October 29, 1982

SUBJECT

Comments on “General Foreign Policy Framework”²

This paper has some of the windiness appropriate to a long-term planning document and I like that, but it’s not very discriminating. It doesn’t make the distinctions and choices that are needed if it really is to drive policy.

1. There is a difference between the justifications and goals of policy. Articulating the nature of the international order to which we aspire is useful more for the former than the latter: it may convince governments and others who have their doubts about us to go along with the short-term actions we take, since our heart is in the right place. But we still have to select the practical objectives for what is, after all, a short time-frame (two years).

2. A revised version of this document should distinguish among different types of objectives: fully-completed accomplishments (to which a President can point in a reelection campaign), accomplishments still underway but with visible progress (to which he can also point), and areas of accomplishment where real groundwork has been laid but no visible payoff yet made. The last category is important (and not just because political opponents may point to it), and a lot of the goals stated in this paper fall into it: institution-mongering, fabric-repairing, and so forth. But they are very difficult from the first two.

3. Given these distinctions, a second draft should probably also consider the ways in which we are—very loosely and often tacitly—willing to trade off among different areas of policy. My own preference, for example, would be to cede some ground in our dispute with the allies over East-West economic policy (where a large part of our agenda is either unattainable or likely to be taken care of by the market) in exchange for stronger and tangible support in other specific areas where they can help us counter the Soviets—whether it’s conventional defense spending, foreign aid, out-of-area deployments, covert action, etc. In other words, this paper may over-focus on the “West” as a whole; we need to consider the specific bargains we will strike with specific partners on specific issues (Glassman calls this idea the “balance-sheet” approach—a good term).

4. This Administration came to power very confident of the galvanizing effects on our doubting allies of American leadership. We probably ought to acknowledge that the payoff has been much less than we hoped in case after case, especially the select three of this paper (Germany, China, Saudi Arabia). It is arguable that each of these three (for powerful internal and other reasons beyond our control) will continue to be less helpful to us over the next two years, no matter how strong our determination to the contrary. If so, we have to have our fall-back positions well prepared; a next cut at this planning exercise should perhaps zero in on these three and compare costs, risks, and benefits of working with them as opposed to others.

5. Finally, planning is not the same as stating your preferences; the chances are quite good that, although we have built a good base in past two years, things will now get worse, not better. It seems to me the following is a fair list of even-money probabilities for six months from now:

A. Pipeline—stalemate with allies, growing bitterness after US proposals flop.

B. Lebanon—further Israel-Syria hostilities, no internal stability, IDF settles in as permanent occupying force.

C. Pakistan—military deliveries suspended due to Congressional pressure and Zia’s disregard of assurances; Paks move toward settlement in UN proximity talks.

D. China—new steps toward detente with Soviets.

E. Mexico—transfer of power disrupted by economic crisis, first signs of civil war.

F. Namibia—breakdown of negotiations for independence; clear Cubans won’t go, period.

Add to this total calm in Poland and the death of Khomeini. Does this suggest we shouldn’t be spinning our wheels on warmed-over Wilsonianism?

Paul:

Re – Meeting on Foreign Policy Planning

—Our papers at Tab 2 summarizing goals, accomplishments and issues/major resource implications still appear sound and provide a good basis for your interventions.²

—Bremer dropped our cover memo containing talking points from the package. It should prove helpful as initial talkers at the meeting. (attached)³

—A basic thread running through our presentation, especially on national security issues, is (if you'll pardon the expression) "stay the course"—we've made only a good start. (Larry wants another START.)

—By contrast, Larry's first paragraph (Tab 3)⁴ speaks of "the Administration's original emphasis . . . on rebuilding American strength and credibility . . . but we have failed to articulate . . . how we intend to use our refound strength and credibility to improve the international order and advance our interests." (emphasis added)

—Beyond this basic difference, there is much we can agree with in Larry's goal of shaping a stronger non-communist order; indeed, we share all three of his key purposes:

- Facilitate recovery prosperity and stability in the West. Indeed it has been S/P that was a voice in the wilderness on the debt issue.

- Provide for peaceful settlement of disputes. We have active diplomatic initiatives going in the Mideast and southern Africa and face a series of additional problems in Afghanistan, Kampuchea, Central America, etc.

- Prevent Soviet expansion. Proxy issue relevant here.

—Larry goes on (p. 2) to set forth a number of tasks essential to strengthening the non-communist order. Again, no big problem with goals, but stated as goals (p. 3) without implementing strategy (e.g. break protectionist cycle, reinvigorate trade, etc.).

—Most contentious point is list of “pivotal countries” (p. 4), which include Germany, Saudi Arabia, China, Japan, Brazil, Mexico and Venezuela.

- Excludes everyone else.
- Implies we should lean very far over backwards not to annoy these countries ever, ever. . . .
- We’ve dealt with “pivotal countries” before (e.g. Iran).
- Better approach is to build our power and devise strategies that “create facts” and thereby help our friends and limit choices of our adversaries.
- Also, simplistic and serious mistake to put all our eggs in any regional basket; if it collapses. We lose all our eggs. . . .
- Each of paragraphs on pp 4–6, on pivotal countries, will suggest obvious rejoinder to you. You could comment especially on Taiwan and Israel. More generally, we fully agree on the need to strengthen the Alliance. But strengthening the Alliance is more likely to result from developing cooperation on the range of allied political, economic, security and regional issues than on achieving harmony by adjusting to lowest common denominator positions.

—Third World section is fairly light. I’d suggest S/P work further with McCormack and Wallis on it. Regional policemen reappear in silly way (Kenya? Mexico? etc.) at bottom of p. 6. Do we want India to police Pakistan? Afghanistan?

—The UN/ICJ stuff (p. 7) under “peaceful settlement of disputes”—the appeal to law—is straight pot.

—The Soviet section (p. 8) moves us toward dialogue from strength and wooing Soviet clients away. Usual Gompert analysis.

—Policy reviews are attached, that flow from above.

—Two final points.

- Resources will continue to be the key, and that means our foreign policy will remain hostage to the revival of our national economy. That’s just the way it is.

- Politics will be in command, especially if the President takes a bath next Tuesday.⁵ This means clear sense of priorities and limited time to achieve them. Democratic Presidential candidates may start announcing shortly after January 1 in order to get matching funds. And this week three reports contained 1984 related items.

—King Hussein worrying whether US would pursue June 1 Reagan plan beyond 1984;

—Soviets saying summit a bad idea because it could help Reagan in 1984;

—Botha questioning Namibia settlement as Reagan could be replaced by Mondale or Kennedy in 1984.

You could have a lot of fun, but shouldn't in the interest of P/EA relations. Nonetheless, lots to say from our pieces, and much to critique in factual, constructive way.

Bon chance.

123. Memorandum From the Deputy Secretary of State (Dam) and the Under Secretary of State for Political Affairs (Eagleburger) to all Assistant Secretaries of State and the Directors of the Policy Planning Staff (Wolfowitz), the Bureau of Politico-Military Affairs (Howe), and the Bureau of Intelligence and Research (Montgomery)¹

Washington, November 3, 1982

SUBJECT

Foreign Policy Directions

The Secretary is most interested in getting underway some fresh thinking about how to advance U.S. world interests. He sees this not merely as a mid-term exercise but one that should set policy directions and favorable trends for the longer haul.

¹ Source: Department of State, Executive Secretariat, S/P Files, Memoranda and Correspondence from the Director of the Policy Planning Staff to the Secretary and Other Seventh Floor Principals: Lot 89D149, S/P Chrons 1/1–15/83. Confidential. Sent through Bremer. No drafting information appears on the memorandum. A stamped date indicates that it was received on November 4 at 6:26 p.m.

The general framework for this work should be the recognition that U.S. interests are best served by a healthy non-communist international order. Such an order requires American leadership, which in turn requires that we sustain the effort to restore U.S. strength and credibility, and to insist on Soviet restraint. Conversely, the healthier the security and economic systems we lead, the stronger our strategic competitive position.

In broad terms, we should be working toward an order in which:

—the “Western” political-economic system—the markets, institutions, and rules of the advanced industrialized countries—is operating effectively and facilitating general growth;

—the developing countries are drawn into this system, thus boosting development and making them less susceptible to disorder and Soviet subversion;

—political problems are overcome in our relations with key countries in vital strategic regions (Central Europe, Southwest Asia, East Asia, and Central America);

—Western diplomacy, supported by effective international dispute-settlement machinery, has reduced the number of festering and potentially dangerous disputes;

—the US is seen—and treated—as the champion of an international order based on the rule of law, peaceful change, and human rights.

It is obviously a lot easier to define such broad goals than to translate them into practical, achievable policies. The Secretary has asked us to ask you to do the hard part. Bearing in mind his general sense of the sort of international order we want to promote, as well as his desire to receive innovative and far-reaching—albeit concrete—ideas, bureaus are being asked to prepare specific policy studies.

Several such studies are tasked below in clusters that correspond to several of the broad goals; others will be tasked in due course as part of what we expect will be an open-ended stream of Department-wide policy planning. Like the challenges we face, the studies are neither strictly regional nor strictly functional. A collegial effort among bureaus will therefore be essential.

We do not want this to become a massive, mechanical exercise. We leave format up to you, asking only that there be separate sections for analysis and prescriptions, and that analysis and arguments be rigorous, objective, and backed up by concrete facts. Prescriptions may, but need not, include specific action plans. The papers need not be formally cleared, though we have indicated where we expect the lead bureau to solicit ideas from others. S/P is invited to offer views on any and of the topics. INR is encouraged to produce analytical papers that dovetail with the issues. Lead bureaus should ensure that differences of opinion are clearly stated.

There are no deadlines. Suffice it to say that the Secretary is keenly interested in these products. As they are completed, he will want to meet on them, by cluster, starting next month. In some cases he will want to assign specific follow-up actions; in others the knowledge we've gained as a result of the process will be the sole product.

This process will be coordinated through S/S—Clay McManaway. Dave Gompert and Ned Walker will be available, along with Clay, to get together with you and/or those you select to do this work, if, for instance you want to clarify or re-shape the studies.

Cluster I—Toward A Healthier Western Political-Economy

1. How can we break protectionist pressures and encourage adjustment in trade and industrial patterns that will curb such pressures in the future? (EB, with inputs from EUR and EA.)

2. How can we revive and adapt Western economic institutions, in light of favorable economic realities? (EB, with inputs from EUR and E.)

3. How can we make U.S., European, and Japanese recovery efforts mutually reinforcing? (EB, with inputs from EUR and EA.)

4. How can we create more mature and stable US–EC and US–Japan political-economic relationships? Should we propose new consultative arrangements? (EUR and EA, respectively, with inputs from EB.)

5. Can we use the effort underway to shape a common Western approach to East-West economic relations as a model to bring about greater harmony in “West-West” economic relations? (EUR, with inputs from EB and EA.)

Cluster II—Overcoming Political Obstacles in Relations with Key Countries in Vital Strategic Regions

1. How can we reinforce German attachment to the West across the broadest range of German political opinion? How can we build a more assertive US–German partnership to deal with some of the problems mentioned in Cluster I? (EUR, with inputs from PM and EB.)

2. What kinds of security relationships do we want, over the long run, with key moderate Arab countries, and how do we get from here to there, taking into account our commitment to Israel and political conditions in the Arab world? (NEA, with inputs from PM.)

3. How can we preserve (or enhance) the strategic benefits of US–Chinese relations—and Sino–Soviet antagonism? (EA)

4. How can we strengthen and use to our advantage, especially in Central America, our relations with key Latin American countries: Mexico, Venezuela, Brazil? How should our “strategic” interests in these relationships affect the bilateral agendas? (ARA)

Cluster III—Drawing the Third World Closer and Erecting Barriers to Disorder and Subversion

1. How can we better engage developing countries in “Western” markets, institutions, rules and consultations? (EB)

2. What are the proper regional roles for Brazil, Nigeria, and India, from the point of view of our interests, and how can we foster these roles? (ARA, AF, NEA)²

In a January 7, 1983, memorandum to the S/P staff, Bosworth requested that they provide their “initial reactions” concerning “the substance and procedure of this project” to Kaplan. (Ibid.)

Foreign Policy Planning

At the end of the most useful discussion of this subject on October 30,² you invited us to send along to you any further thoughts we had. The

In an October 29 memorandum to Dam, Eagleburger, Wolfowitz, Howe, Burt, Crocker, Bosworth, and Veliotis, Bremer conveyed Shultz’s invitation to the meeting, which would discuss the two papers prepared by the Policy Planning Staff in response to Meese’s September 16 request (see Document 119 and Tabs B and C thereto) and Eagleburger’s September 9 memorandum to Shultz (see Document 117). thoughts below are offered in that spirit. While they inevitably reflect an AF perspective, they are hopefully relevant to others and might help us bridge some important gaps between bureaus.

Foreign Policy Planning Process and Structure

Foreign policy planning staffs are subject to well-known dilemmas and pitfalls. Typically, they become one of three things: (a) irrelevant, (b) speechwriters, (c) operators in the sense of direct competition with the operating bureaus and offices. I know of no abstract structural solution to this problem. Much depends on the quality of people and the chemistry between them.

I do know, however, that the session on October 30 was the most stimulating and worthwhile exchange among Department principals that I have witnessed in some two years in this job. From my perspective, there is a severe structural problem between the sixth- and seventh-floor levels of this building, one that goes back many years and is accounted for in part by the high level of decentralization and dispersion of authority in the building. Partly, it is a simple question of access to very busy senior people, including you. But it is also partly the absence of any forum for trial-ballooning, exchanging ideas, and arguing free of bureaucratic turf constraints. There is a lot of intellectual horsepower at your disposal if there is a way to organize it. I suggest you give consideration to further brainstorming sessions, but I believe that a longer block of intensive time away from telephone, in-boxes, and the building itself would be the way to really address the issues.

The Domestic Base for Foreign Policy

There was apparent consensus on October 30 that we could do a lot better in addressing and strengthening our domestic base. At times we have taken an unnecessary bath, both in terms of being accused of things that are not true and in terms of getting no credit for viable and effective policies. Speaking for AF, my clients overseas in Africa and Europe understand and appreciate what we are doing far better than "US public opinion." I see three remedies: (a) the White House itself must fight more visibly on behalf of its foreign policy; (b) we are not bad at stating what we are against, but there has been a paucity of articulate advocacy on behalf of what we are for, especially as it pertains to the Third World; (c) we have paid a price over the past two years for creating the impression that there is no access to senior people by black Americans with concerns about foreign policy.

The Allies

This bureau conducts a very active dialogue through periodic consultations and ad hoc exchanges with our most important allies in Africa: Britain, France, Germany, Italy, Canada, Portugal, Japan, and Belgium. I sometimes feel that we do so in a vacuum because other parts of this building and of Washington have no appreciation for the importance of Africa in the eyes of our allies. This shows up continuously when briefing papers are tasked for high-level discussions between us and our allies. When US principals fail to raise African issues, or are inadequately briefed when allies raise them, it undercuts the extensive groundwork laid in the working levels. On the whole, we have relatively good coordination and cooperation with most of our allies on African issues, but we could do a lot better if the message was reinforced from the top. Since we are always short of resources for African policy, this is one good way to get more out of our alliance relationships.

North-South Economic Issues

In the absence of an overall policy framework in the economic field for relations with the Third World—apart from the expectations raised at Cancun—we have nonetheless been forced by events to develop a number of initiatives and responses for dealing with the African economic crisis. We have made some progress in the inter-agency and allied contexts in addressing the fundamentally inter-related issues of IMF conditionality,³ debt relief, and development assistance; but we have a long way to go. Moreover, we are viewed as primarily talking the language of austerity. We are viewed by Africans as having identified the need for policy reform and having the sticks available to insist upon it, but we are also viewed as having very little in the way of carrots. Obviously, carrots can cost money, but there are certainly ideas we should be exploring in the area of trade policy, development assistance, and support for the private sector. AF would be pleased to present our perspective in a future brainstorming session, after which we might be able to staff out some serious ideas with other relevant offices. But I would despair of trying to do this in the formal, bureaucratic channel, given the sensitivities and turf issues that exist.

U.S. Foreign Policy and the Private Sector

Logically, the private sector should be one of the strongest supporters of our foreign policy, but the truth is that the private sector is probably as much confused and mystified as it is supportive. On the one hand, we have made clear in no uncertain terms that private enterprise is the key to economic recovery and economic development in the Third World. This message is enshrined as a matter of declaratory policy in our bilateral aid programs and in our support for IMF and IBRD policies which go in the same general direction. Here in AF, we have pushed our overseas posts and our colleagues in the economic agencies to push aggressively the importance of getting our private sector involved and of creating the necessary climate in Africa to attract it.

But our private sector emperor has no clothes. We have taken few steps to either add incentives or remove disincentives to greater U.S. private sector involvement overseas. As a result, our credibility on the private sector scene is weak, both with Third World countries and with our own private sector. Our failure to support increases for the EXIM Bank, our unwillingness to countenance the use of AID funds as a form of mixed credits, the lack of any new funding to support foreign assistance initiatives and the mortgaging of existing money in older projects all add up to a negative message. Both OPIC and AID's new private enterprise bureau⁴ are spread far too thin to respond to more than one or two opportunities in each region. With the notable exception of some agri-business teams flowing out of the Cancun Summit, which have taken more than a year to organize and deploy, our bureaucratic machinery has done very little to promote positive linkages between U.S. investors and the Third World.

Then, there is the question of how politics and our policies impact on trade and investment and, therefore, on our firms. This is the pipeline issue writ large. We have chosen—or not been able to resist the temptation—to use our firms, our credits and our votes in the IFI's as an expression of our broader policy towards such places as Libya, Angola, and Ethiopia. To take the Ethiopian case, Boeing—the largest industrial exporter in the U.S.—believes itself to be in danger of losing the entire African market to Airbus industry.⁵ Boeing and Lockheed both see their positions in Angola to be endangered by our cautious restrictions on their activity there.

To raise these questions is not to solve them. Rather, I wanted to point out the fact that many companies see little direct benefit to our foreign policy from such USG positions but considerable damage to their commercial interests. They see little understanding or concrete support for their activity abroad. They find this administration taking actions which disadvantage both trade and investment, at a time when even socialist governments overseas are providing liberal support to help their companies win the competition. Finally, our friends in the Third World, forced by economic crisis to become more pragmatic and to listen to our economic philosophy, are finding us no more able than our predecessors to support the role of the private sector in their countries in a concrete fashion.

⁵ In telegram 295445 to London and Paris, October 20, the Department reported that Boeing's Washington representative had called several offices in the Department and stated "that Boeing believes Airbus may be undertaking to arrange a leasing agreement with EAL through a third party, and that the leased aircraft could later become a direct sale to EAL." (Department of State, Central Foreign Policy File, Electronic Telegrams, D820524–0486)

A Final Note on Process

Realistically, these and other ideas you get are more numerous than you can take on without support and an operational planning process. My suggestion is that more brainstorming and free exchange should come first. If the time and venue could be arranged, it would be ideal to assemble the ingredients of a rich conceptual stew and let it cook over the course of a day or more. You could then select those few actions and concepts that are viable, and direct specific, follow-on planning efforts led by Ken Dam and other 7th floor principals. In some fields, you may wish to include individuals outside the bureaucracy in concert or parallel with our own senior people.

125. Editorial Note

On November 15, 1982, President Ronald Reagan met with the newly-elected Chancellor of the Federal Republic of Germany Helmut Kohl. During his welcoming remarks, made at 11:06 a.m. on the South Lawn of the White House, the President stated: "The future of both our nations depends so much on friendship and the values we share. In these uncertain times, when a power to the East has built a massive war machine far in excess of any legitimate defensive needs, the Western democracies must stand firmly together if our freedom and peace of the world are to be preserved." (Public Papers: Reagan, 1982, Book II, page 1467)

Reagan and Kohl then met with U.S. and West German officials in the Oval Office from 11:44 a.m. until 12:25 p.m. (Reagan Library, President's Daily Diary) At 12:25 p.m. the President escorted the Chancellor to the State Dining Room for a working luncheon, where they were joined by the attendees from the earlier meeting in addition to other U.S. and West

German officials. During the luncheon, which lasted until 1:35 p.m., the President referenced the change in Soviet leadership following the death of Soviet General Secretary Leonid Brezhnev on November 10 and the elevation of Yuri Andropov to the position of General Secretary: "The discussion turned to the new Soviet leadership. The President said that it was his evaluation that the new Soviet leader [Yuri Andropov] would be a very tough adversary. He did not see great changes in Soviet policy. The Soviet Union was faced with major economic problems. The change of leadership gave an opportunity to let the Soviet Union know publicly that they could easily have better relations with the West 'if they changed their ways.' The President said that the Soviets did not have to make any great public announcements about changed behavior, but only to take a specific action. If they would take an action to indicate a willingness to deal peacefully with the rest of the world, the United States would be prepared to take an immediate reciprocal action, to meet their quid with a quo."

Following Kohl's remarks about Soviet leaders, Communist economic development, and Reagan's impact on European audiences, the President returned to the issue of Soviet leadership: "The President pointed out that there were two common explanations for Soviet behavior: One was that the Soviets were following the teaching of Marx and spreading the world revolution of the proletariat. The second explanation was they were paranoid and afraid and were expanding in order to protect themselves. The President pointed out that it was absurd for the Russians to believe that any country was out to conquer them. He asked the Chancellor's opinion on this question.

"The Chancellor replied that both explanations were correct. Fundamentally, Soviet policy was Russian policy. Marxist-Leninist ideology was an addition, but underneath Soviet policy was imperial great Russian policy. Historically, the Soviet Union had no defensible frontiers. The approaches to the homeland had been wide plains, therefore traditionally the Soviets had attempted to build buffer zones. This explained much of the history of Poland. Twice invading armies from Western Europe had reached the Soviet capital—Napoleon and Hitler. Chancellor Kohl said the President was right. No country seriously threatened the Soviet Union, least of all the Federal Republic. From a rational point of view there was no threat, but there was an irrational but deep fear among the Russian people, which the government exploited to justify military expenditures. The Chancellor noted that he and the President as politicians knew the importance of irrational emotions held by people and how they must be taken into account. It was also important to look at history. In the 19th century, the Russians had had the same fears and Bismarck had recognized these and was therefore careful to maintain the balance which would keep the Russians satisfied. On the other hand, this fear also offered an opportunity that could be exploited. It was a key element of Russian policy never to take great risks, never to move when the risks were high. The only recent exception to this had been the move into Afghanistan.

"The President recalled the analysis done in two books by Laurence Beilenson, a lawyer who had become an historian after retirement. He had written three books about history, the first, called The Treaty Trap had shown that any country which had put its faith in treaties rather than building up its defenses had failed to protect its national interests. The second book, on the use of subversion, had shown that although many countries in history had used subversion against their adversaries to a certain extent, Lenin had uniquely based an entire approach to foreign policy on it. Beilenson had also found that the Soviets or the Russians would not make an aggressive move if it risked a threat to their homeland. They would never gamble if there were a threat to Russia itself. The President said he could not help but remember 1928 when the Soviets had made a proposal for worldwide disarmament. He wished that someone would remind them of that. The President said that he had been recently pursuing quiet diplomacy with the Soviets. As a politician he knew that if he made public demands on the Soviets they would find it impossible to give in, so he had privately asked for a gesture, a concrete action from the Soviets. The President cited as an example the Pentecostals who were in the basement of the U.S. Embassy in Moscow. Their release was the sort of gesture he was looking for. If the Soviets took such an action, the U.S. would not publicize it, but would reciprocate with an appropriate response. The President said that President Nixon had been able to operate in this fashion. He had asked Brezhnev to take a number of actions privately and Brezhnev had taken some of them. President Nixon had responded immediately with reciprocal actions.

"Chancellor Kohl said that the most important issue of the day was peace, that is, peace and freedom. He recalled from his family history that his mother's brother had been killed in World War I, that his parents had then given the same name to his older brother and that brother had been killed in World War II. Chancellor Kohl had given the same name to his son, although his mother had opposed it and that son was now serving in the army before going to university. The Chancellor said he told the story as he understood the President was a man with a heart, a man who could see the human aspects of the problems which confronted him. It was necessary to see the human side of great problems, while not neglecting the danger and the threat. The Chancellor continued to discuss the INF deployments. He said that if in the fall the negotiations had not achieved results in Geneva he expected all of the basing countries to go forward with their deployments, but even if they did not, the Federal Republic would. The Chancellor said that he had made this clear in his party platform.

“President Reagan said that he was willing to deal with the Soviet Union on a human basis. He recalled that when he was recovering in the hospital from being shot, he had written a letter by hand to Brezhnev asking him to sit down together to talk about the aspirations of their people and what their leaders could do for them. The President said he didn’t know if Brezhnev ever saw the letter, since the reply came through normal diplomatic channels and contained all the normal Soviet propaganda. That did not mean he would give up trying to establish contact with the Soviet leadership. He would try again, but as the Chancellor had said, never losing sight of the threat. It was important for the Soviets to understand that the United States would not buy peace at any price.” (Memorandum of Conversation, November 15; Reagan Library, Executive Secretariat, NSC Subject File, Memorandums of Conversation—President Reagan (11/01/1982–12/06/1982)) The full memorandum of conversation is scheduled for publication in Foreign Relations, 1981–1988, volume VII, Western Europe, 1981–1984.

Following the luncheon, Reagan and Kohl spoke at the Diplomatic Entrance on the South Lawn of the White House. For their remarks and a joint statement released following the discussions and dated November 15, see Public Papers: Reagan, 1982, Book II, pages 1469–1475. In his personal diary entry for November 15, the President noted: “Our meeting was good. He is entirely different than his predecessor—very warm & outgoing. Mrs. Kohl is the same & very charming.” (Brinkley, ed., The Reagan Diaries, volume I, January 1981–October 1985, page 172) Secretary of State George Shultz provided a brief description of Kohl’s visit in his memoir, writing: “Helmut Kohl had come to Washington for meetings on November 15 as the new chancellor. Kohl and President Reagan and I had similar impressions of Andropov, the new Soviet leader: formidable, experienced, tough; we agreed we needed to know him better. Kohl emphasized the importance of a firm and cohesive NATO alliance as the only hope for success in the crucial INF negotiations with Moscow. But it must be ‘a real negotiation, not just a show,’ he said.” (Shultz, Turmoil and Triumph, page 149)

126. Remarks by Vice President Bush¹

Nairobi, November 19, 1982

Remarks Before the Kenya Chamber of Commerce

You do the United States a great honor in receiving me this evening. I bring you the greetings of the President of the United States and of millions of my fellow citizens who are sincerely interested in America's longstanding friendship with the Continent and people of Africa. I bring also special greetings to President Daniel arap Moi and to all Kenyans. Your country is an old friend of the United States and is dear to us all.

The past 10 days have been important to me. President Reagan asked me to carry our message of friendship and deep commitment to a true partnership with the nations of Africa. We are determined to work with the leaders of this continent in the quest for peace and progress.² My visit has been particularly satisfying. It has permitted us to see old friends and make new ones.

I have exchanged views with some of Africa's most impressive leaders. I have had an opportunity to see and feel firsthand the diversity of this beautiful continent and to sense its great promise. In several days I will be able to share with President Reagan and my fellow Americans the thinking of Africa's leaders on the major issues important to us.

It should come as no surprise to you that President Reagan thought that it was especially important for me to visit Kenya. Since Kenya's independence,³ close ties have bound our two countries and peoples.

Bush departed Washington on November 10 for Cape Verde, Senegal, Nigeria, Zimbabwe, Zambia, Kenya, Zaire, and Bermuda. On November 14–15, Bush traveled to Moscow and headed the U.S. delegation to Brezhnev's funeral. He then returned to the United States on November 24. For the text of the Vice President's statements, remarks, and toasts made during the trip, in addition to the text of the U.S.-Nigeria joint communiqué, see ibid., pp. 34–45, and 49–51.

² In a November 4 memorandum to Bush regarding the African trip, Shultz wrote: "Your trip provides a timely opportunity to demonstrate this administration's interest in Africa and our support for our friends on the continent; articulate the activist policies we are pursuing; and emphasize our determination to achieve peace in Southern Africa. All of the countries on your itinerary have important roles to play in addressing the major issues confronting the West in Africa." After noting the importance of the countries to be visited, Shultz underscored: "Your stature guarantees that the trip will attract widespread African attention and will enhance African perceptions of our concerns for their continent and its problems." (Reagan Library, George Shultz Papers, Official Memoranda; NLR 775-26A-32-2-5)

³ Kenya achieved independence on December 12, 1963.

Your nation has been admired in the United States for its political and economic record.

We share important values—democratically elected governments, civilian rule, freedom of press and religion, a multiracial society, and an economy guided by the principles of free enterprise. Kenya has been a strong advocate for peace in the world. Your country and its distinguished president have led the Organization of African Unity (OAU) during a year in which Africa faced many problems. Because Kenya has served this year as spokesman for Africa's aspirations, I am especially pleased to speak from the city of Nairobi to all the people of Africa. I particularly wish to speak about the hopes and values which grew up during Africa's struggle for independence and which will guide Africa as it faces the future. Chief among these values is the desire for freedom—freedom of nations from outside pressures and freedom of people within nations. That desire gave birth to the OAU, thanks to the recognition that—without regional cooperation—the peace, progress, and independence of Africa would not be maintained. Such cooperation is not an easy goal given the great variety of peoples, circumstances, and cultures in Africa. This tremendous diversity, coupled with the harsh impact of today's global economic recession, underscores more than ever the importance of African regional cooperation for common purposes.

There is no justification for despair about Africa's future. Despite trials and setbacks, the history of Africa since the independence era has included significant progress, especially in the development of human resources. Education, talent, and energy—such as that represented by this very audience—prove that Africa has the capacity make good the promise of its enormous potential in spite of the many problems it faces. Thanks to the abilities and values which men and women, like ourselves, bring to the everyday task of national development, Africa can enter its third decade of independence with confidence in the future.

Because we believe that Africa has the capacity and will to be master of its destiny, President Reagan has over the past 20 months worked to forge a new and mature partnership with the nations and people of Africa. We speak of a partnership that begins with mutual respect. We speak of a partnership that includes honest discussions. We speak of a partnership which recognizes that each nation must do its part if the goals we share are to be achieved. Partnership is a two-way street based on shared goals, common principles, and mutual interests.

These principles have guided our Administration's policies toward Africa. The time is ripe for the sort of candid dialogue I have been privileged to experience on this trip. And I have learned a lot. A top priority in our diplomacy is southern Africa, where the choices between regional strife and regional cooperation are stark. The inescapable need for peaceful change is challenged by a climate of fear, distrust, foreign intervention, and cross-border violence.

Search for Constructive Change in Southern Africa

The United States is committed to the search for constructive change in southern Africa. In cooperation with our allies and in direct response to the will of Africa's leaders, the United States has engaged its influence and resources in the effort to bring Namibia to independence. We are determined to help turn the sad tide of growing conflict and tension in southern Africa. We are fully committed to work for a settlement that will enhance regional security and assure Namibia's early independence on terms acceptable to its people, Africa, and the world at large.

Let me state again, we are fully committed to an independent Namibia. I can assure you that significant progress has been made. A year ago the settlement effort was relaunched with vigor. Since then, the United States and its Western Contact Group partners have worked closely and intensively with all parties. This past July agreement was reached on the principles which will guide Namibia's constituent assembly.⁴ Since then, substantial progress has been made on remaining issues concerning the implementation of Security Council Resolution 435.⁵ We are close to agreement on implementation of the U.N. plan. Remaining issues can be resolved.

From the outset of this Administration's engagement in the peace process, we have emphasized that there are vitally important issues arising from the situation in Angola which must be resolved if Namibia's independence is to be achieved. For 7 years Angola has been engulfed in war, its territory invaded, its progress toward a better economic future stalled. Thousands of Cuban troops remain in Angola. Wouldn't Angola and the region itself be better off with all foreign forces out of that country—South African forces and Cuban forces?

The history of foreign conquest in Africa is replete with examples of armed foreigners who came with the professed purpose of helping others but who stayed in order to help themselves. The withdrawal of Cuban forces from Angola in a parallel framework with South Africa's

⁴ Reference is to the July Contact Group negotiations. On July 13, the Department reported that Pérez de Cuellar had been informed "by representatives of the five Western nations—the United States, France, West Germany, Britain and Canada—that 'all parties to the negotiation now accept the principles concerning the constituent assembly and the constitution for an independent Namibia.'" (Bernard Weinraub, "U.S. Reports Progress in Namibia Talks," New York Times, July 14, 1982, p. A3) departure from Namibia is the key to the settlement we all desire. In the final analysis, it is also the surest way to guarantee Angola's long-term security and independence. The United States wants the earliest possible independence for Namibia. At the same time, the United States wants an end to Angola's suffering and to the dangerous cycle of violence in the region. My government is not ashamed to state the U.S. interest in seeing an end to the presence of Cuban forces in Angola. Their introduction 7 years ago tore the fabric of reciprocal restraint between the United States and the Soviet Union in the developing world. Such restraint is vital if African regional security and the global balance are to be maintained.

We recognize there will be no agreement unless all the parties know that their security is protected. We also recognize there will be no settlement unless each party is prepared to make the concessions necessary. If the challenge is accepted, we believe peace can be achieved and a brighter future for southern Africa can begin. The substantial progress already made is based on a diplomatic partnership of equals in which all parties share burdens. That partnership remains vital in our continuing efforts for peace. In the search for that peace, the United States seeks constructive relations with all the states of southern Africa. We are building bridges of communication to each nation in the region, including South Africa.

However, we will not ignore or disguise our strong belief in the importance of justice and equality before the law. Apartheid is wrong. It is legally entrenched racism—inimical to the fundamental ideals of the United States. America's history and America's future can only be understood in terms of our commitment to a multiracial democracy in which all citizens participate and from which all benefit. The rule of law, the principles of consent and participation in the political process, and the right of every human being to citizenship which reflects these principles are to Americans a sacred trust. We will not betray this trust.

Nor can we escape reality: If there is to be security in southern Africa, South Africa must be involved in shaping it. If there is to be constructive change in South Africa, South Africans of all races—not foreigners—must be the ones who shape the pattern of that change. The United States is working for constructive change in ways that benefit all South Africans. Our actions match our words, as our deepening involvement in expanding educational, social, and economic opportunities for black South Africans demonstrates. We also believe there is a relationship between the security of southern Africa and the pace of peaceful change within South Africa. We do not believe that armed conflict must be the road to justice, and we doubt that it can be the road to lasting freedom and well-being.

Support for Human Rights and Regional Stability

The United States believes that it can be helpful in advancing the frontier of freedom and observance of human rights, not only in southern Africa but in Africa as a whole. Without respect for human rights, there is a great risk that Africa's enormous human potential will be wasted. Fear and intimidation keep people from working to achieve their aspirations, from contributing to the common good, and from pursuing the democratic principles and ideals that are denied for too many in the world today. Narrowing political participation by their citizens can be highly counterproductive. African nations that have devised their own national democratic institutions broaden public participation in government, protect the integrity of the individual, and expand the frontier of economic freedom for the ultimate good of all.

In Kenya respect for individual rights is written in your constitution. Democratic institutions that embody the democratic process have been established. They are an essential framework for lasting stability. Experience in Africa and elsewhere clearly demonstrates that the abuse of power, the suppression of diversity, and the denial of individual rights only leads to instability and a loss of confidence at home and abroad. My visit to Africa has shown me encouraging examples of African nations that are building their own institutions to broaden political participation and advance the frontier of freedom. We realize, however, that nations cannot reap the benefits of individual freedom in an environment of insecurity. We attach high importance to strengthening Africa's security and are prepared to be Africa's partner in building the necessary conditions for security.

We have no interest in an East-West confrontation in Africa; such a confrontation increases the threat to world peace. The goal of the United States in Africa is to help establish a framework for restraint and broad rules of conduct which discourage the use of outside force in African conflicts in the region. In this area our goal is consistent with the goals enshrined in the Charter of the Organization of African Unity.

At the same time, the United States is deeply sensitive to the threats which individual nations and the regions of this continent face and probably will continue to face. Internal stability, often fueled by outside interference, and longstanding border and ethnic disputes tax heavily the resources of African governments. The United States has no mandate to act as a policeman in Africa, and it seeks no such role. But neither do we believe that the sovereignty of African nations will be preserved if the West is unable or unwilling to respond to the legitimate defense needs of its friends in Africa. The United States intends to be a reliable partner both in working with our friends on a long-term basis to meet these needs and in responding to their urgent requirements in emergency situations. We have done so in the past; we are doing so today. Let there be no doubt about our determination and capability to do so in the future.

At the same time, our overall concern, including the concern that guides our military assistance, is to dissuade countries from undertaking military solutions and to encourage negotiated settlements of differences between them. We believe negotiated solutions are possible for even the most difficult and longstanding disputes on the continent. We are ready to lend whatever support we can to those efforts in Africa and to give them the highest priority. In this view, we believe that Africa's capacity for collective security deserves our help. We will, when asked, support multinational peacekeeping forces that Africa creates in its own defense. The record of the United States in support of the OAU peacekeeping role in Chad is the most recent illustration of the importance we attached to regional security. We want African nations to be able to defend their interests and resolve their problems without foreign intervention.

Response to Economic Crisis

Real security, and with it the confidence that can enhance prospects for peace, cannot be achieved without sustained economic growth. During my travels, I have seen Africa's most serious economic crisis in more than 40 years. Because African countries are often dependent on one or two export commodities—and because they have borrowed heavily to spur growth and meet the costs of higher oil prices—they have been vulnerable to commodity fluctuations, high interest rates, and to the impact of world recession. There has been a long, slow decline in per capita food production, population has increased rapidly, and balanced growth has not occurred. Many nations have experimented with subsidies, centralized economic direction, and extensive public ownership of industry and commerce. Those strategies have proved costly.

The present state of the global economy is not of Africa's making. In the world economic system, the United States has a special responsibility not only to put its own house in order but to help rekindle growth in other lands. We are deeply committed to that task, and to achieve it the American people are making real sacrifices. We are confident that when we are successful Africa will benefit quickly and significantly.

At the most fundamental level, we will remain concerned about those imperiled by strife and starvation. We have taken the lead both in mobilizing international relief efforts to help African refugees and in providing emergency assistance. In the past 2 years the United States has provided Africa $187 million for such programs. But we are equally concerned about the underlying problems which produce refugees and other forms of human misery.

As we all look at these problems, we can see that the next few years in Africa will be critical. The current economic situation is forcing austerity on all African nations. It points to the need for reexamination of economic strategies and national economic policies. It would be a mistake to view this period as only a temporary phenomenon and to believe that as the world recession begins to ease, Africa will be able to resume an easy path of growth and diversity. On the contrary, in the current situation many fundamental decisions must be made about the future of African development, about the priorities of agriculture and other sectors, and about the degree of sacrifice that should be demanded of the various elements of the population. How these decisions are made will affect the future of African development for decades to come.

We in the United States admit that there are serious differences among experts over the best path to development. We believe that there should be a full exchange among all those involved in African development. We must reach a common agreement regarding the kinds of programs which must be developed, financed, and mobilized. Discipline and self-reliance are necessary. Courageous leadership is necessary. Now is the time for fresh thinking, an eschewing of old ideologies that have not passed the test of experience.

We are prepared to help give African governments the wherewithal and the international political and financial backing to take the steps where necessary to restructure their economies.

During the past 2 years, a growing number of African countries have applied to the International Monetary Fund (IMF) for assistance in meeting immediate balance-of-payments crises. This has led to difficult adjustments in exchange rates, budgets, and other aspects of economic policy.

Recognizing the fundamental nature of the development crisis, we have encouraged a more comprehensive approach by both donors and multilateral agencies in Africa. We have urged that reform be supported with short-term foreign exchange and development assistance adequate to fuel the recovery process. We are fully aware of the importance of debt in this equation. Where countries are making serious efforts to restructure their economies, relief from heavy debt must be part of the foreign exchange program. For our part, we are committed to participating in the difficult process of recovery.

The United States, despite the fact that its resources are under special strain in this time of economic adversity, still remains committed to Africa's stabilization and growth. Our bilateral economic aid for all of Africa now totals approximately $800 million a year and extends to 46 countries throughout Africa. It encompasses a variety of programs, including fast-disbursing balance-of-payments support, food aid, and development assistance. Including the U.S. contribution to multilateral programs, our total economic aid to sub-Saharan Africa is in excess of $1.4 billion annually. Of the multilateral portion, the largest share by far—almost $300 million per year—goes to the soft loan programs of the World Bank's International Development Association.

The Reagan Administration has placed a new emphasis on the role of private enterprise in development. In Africa, as elsewhere, we define "private sector" broadly to include small businesses and farmers, as well as large corporations. Our aid planners are seeking new ways to help develop market institutions and more effective incentives for farmers. Wherever possible, we are encouraging mutually beneficial partnerships between large and small American companies and their African counterparts. The recent enactment of export trading legislation supported by President Reagan will make it possible for small and medium-size U.S. firms to pool expenses and thereby play a more active economic role in Africa.

The economic task that you and we face is enormous. But it is far from impossible if we all work together in a wise and understanding partnership. The exact nature of that cooperation will be as varied as the countries of Africa, but it will have some common elements. We, the industrialized countries, must help Africans manage their debt burden so that private credit, which is so essential to growth, can resume and increase. We must support successful economic policies at both the national and regional levels. We must seek greater coordination among Africa's friends who wish to finance development. The importance of Africa's economic future demands that we do no less.

As we all look to the future and decide how Africa and the United States can work together, the agenda of issues we face is long. It includes essential issues of security, peacemaking, human rights, and economic progress. It calls for advancing the frontiers of freedom.

The United States is a friend which respects your potential and shares your commitment to maintaining the hard-won prize of freedom. With respect to that freedom, our nations are equals which must be prepared to work together, making sacrifices and taking tough decisions at the same time. Each of us has a share of the burden to carry; each has a contribution to make. All have a better future to gain. This is the meaning of a true partnership.

127. Paper Prepared in the National Security Council Staff¹

Washington, undated

President Reagan is personally committed to peace.

Prevention of conflict and reduction of weapons are the most important public issues of our time.

For at least 30 years after World War II, the United States possessed a large military advantage over the Soviet Union. Our strength deterred aggression against us.

Our military objective has always been to maintain peace by preventing war. The irony of modern times is that it still takes weapons to prevent war.

Peace is a goal, not a policy. To achieve lasting peace, the President has two parallel paths—deterrence and arms reductions.

The combination of the Soviets spending more and the US spending proportionally less has changed the military balance and weakened our ability to deter war.

Together with our Allies, we have begun to correct the military imbalance. Part of that correction is the President's decision on where to base the long-range Peacekeeper missile, formerly called the M-X, which has been developed under his three immediate predecessors.²

While modernizing our military, the President is also searching for significant arms reductions.

Never before has the US proposed such a comprehensive program of nuclear arms control as we have put forward in the past year.

Three major negotiations with the Soviets are already underway—aimed at completely eliminating intermediate-range missiles, at deep reductions in the long-range missile arsenal, and at cutting conventional military forces in Europe.

It is significant that the Soviets are negotiating seriously with us at Geneva and Vienna. They know that we are serious about our own strategic programs and that they must negotiate in earnest.

The latest additions to our arms control initiative are measures to reduce the risks of accident and misunderstanding and thus strengthen mutual confidence between the US and Soviet Union.

These include:

- Advance notification of all US and Soviet intercontinental ballistic missile test launches, and other such tests.
- Advance notification of major military exercises.
- Exchange of information about nuclear forces.
- Examination of the Hotline system between the US and USSR for possible improvements.³

The President's commitment to peace continues to preserve our freedom, and it offers promise of a safer and less threatening world. We should support this dual approach—deterrence and arms reductions—as the best possible way to maintain the peace we now enjoy, and ensure it for future generations.

³ On June 20, 1963, at Geneva, U.S. and Soviet representatives to the Eighteen Nation Disarmament Conference (ENDC) completed negotiations on a memorandum of understanding (14 UST 825) establishing a direct communications link, known as a "hotline." On September 30, 1971, a working group of the U.S. and Soviet SALT delegations updated the agreement to add two additional satellite circuits to the "hotline."

128. Editorial Note

On December 16, 1982, Deputy Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs Robert McFarlane took part in a United States Information Agency (USIA) background briefing for reporters. McFarlane discussed the Ronald Reagan administration's foreign policy accomplishments for 1982 and prospects for 1983. McFarlane began his remarks by indicating that he would "be glad to say a few things" and then respond to questions: "Nearing the two-year mark in the Reagan administration's stewardship in foreign affairs, the President believes that there have been substantial gains in his efforts to foster a more stable climate for peaceful change internationally, as measured in most political and economic terms.

"I think probably organizationally for me, if not for you, that it might be useful if I just touched on the six basic goals and where those have been advanced in the past year.

"You will recall that the President's objectives included, first, reversing the decline in the strength of the United States in establishing a firm foundation of restored military strength. Secondly, to establish a stable basis for U.S. relations with the Soviet Union, based on reciprocity and restraint.

"Thirdly, to foster an improved relationship in the context of North-South relations with developing countries.

"Fourthly, to take a vigorous role in peacemaking internationally because the moral responsibility to do it as well as self interest in key areas.

"Next, to establish an improved relationship of solidarity with our leading allies, the principal industrialized democracies and, next, to undertake a very vigorous program of arms control talks.

"Well, what has happened in these areas in the past year?

"First of all, his efforts to sustain the restoration of U.S. military strength has carried on apace. The second year's budget is being debated even as we sit here. However, the certain outcome with respect to 90 percent of the President's proposals is all but assured. These programs, as you know, are across-the-board efforts to modernize the U.S. strategic force posture as well as conventional or general purpose forces, and to maintain a vigorous research and development effort to be able to compensate, frankly, in some measure, for the Soviet advantage in numbers, whether one talks in tanks or aircraft or whatever.

"And this has gone well. It has required a more determined effort at persuasion in the Congress but the consensus among the American people is still there to sustain the expenditures for restored military strength. I've been a little puzzled at polls, and I won't digress, but recently they've been portraying that sentiment in America at large as declining, and the figure of 17 percent has been quoted here and there and without looking at the poll which portrayed that the American people think that we ought to spend at least what we are doing or more, by almost 70 percent.

"What we are spending is built upon a very high increase that was set last year. So to sustain that or even improve it still commands a very substantial majority here.

"With respect to what is being done in U.S.-Soviet relations, the President has made clear that the United States is willing to negotiate toward the resolution of problems across the board and this past year has seen the—call it—‘completion of’ the most comprehensive arms control proposals that have been put forward by any modern President, in my recollection.

“At the same time the President has maintained a position of firmness with respect to Soviet repression from Afghanistan to Poland and a position of firmness toward Soviet efforts to expand its influence in other developing countries, notably in this hemisphere, through Cuba, into Central America, and in the past year there has been some evolution in that in a positive sense. That is, that U.S. assistance to these countries has been, on the one hand, sufficient to enable them to hold their own. I wouldn’t go beyond that. But I think, frankly, the expression of U.S. interest and commitment has fostered a different sense of what the future might hold for these countries. We see that manifested not in the tide of battle so much as in events in these countries, political events, elections being held.

“I’ll get to that in a moment. But the four countries of the Central American Democratic Council, the San Jose Conference, the statement of principles, and the formation of a sense of cohesion and some optimism for a democratic future has truly taken on a measure of momentum in the past year, as reflected in these elections in the four countries in Central America.

“With respect to U.S. relations with our allies in Europe, it has been a stormy year and, yet, I think a healthy year as we sit here today, in December, when you look across the spectrum of disagreements that have been taken on and dealt with in the past 12 months.

“We’ve had a measure of allied support, rather strong support, for sustaining continued commitment to defense buildup, a restoration of the balance, as put out in the NATO communiqués in both the ministerial meetings in May and in December of this year.

“The President’s travel to Europe and his visit to several capitals afforded an opportunity in his public addresses there, in Bonn as well as in London, to announce and, I think, engender a measure of support for furthering democratic institutions throughout the world, and this was followed up by the Conference on Free Elections and Democratization in Communist Countries here last month. It’s also been followed up by our increased investment in broadcasting resources which will enable us to better present and project the message of democracy into communist countries.

“We’ve had our share of disagreements and particularly in the area of international economic relations.

“The President’s purpose in this area was, as you know, to ask our allies to consider East-West economic relations from the perspective of national security, their national security and ours, and how we ought to harmonize, where possible, our policies in East-West trade, credits, technology transfer, so forth, in order to assure that our own security interests are being enhanced and that we are not contributing to the very threat we are asking our own populations to defend against.

"The dialogue, begun really last year, was intensified and at Versailles led to a certain measure of agreement with respect to improving restraint on credits flowing to the East and soon thereafter, clearly, to a measure of disagreement with the enactment by the President of sanctions for the transfer of oil and gas technology and equipment to the Soviet Union.

"And here, a fundamental disagreement led to a very intense round of negotiations which reached a climax at Las Epiniere at the NATO meeting in Canada in September at which point I think the seriousness with which the President viewed this issue was captured by our allied friends and that led to further talks, ultimately to the summary of conclusions, for the conduct of international economic relations with the East.

"This summary of conclusions is but a statement of principles which—and a work program—which must be translated not into study effort which I think, from my own perspective, having worked in NATO relations for about 20 years, is rather remarkable. I think all of you who cover NATO are surely conscious of the fact that whether we talk about military strategy or political matters, that forging any kind of Allied consensus in either area has been extremely difficult; it's taken a long, long time. And usually at the end we end up with outcomes, such as in NATO strategy, where we have fundamental disagreements as to what that strategy really requires.

"This has led us, out of frustration, simply not to undertake these studies or these efforts in the past. In the past decade, if you look at really serious effort that's been devoted to harmonizing our policies, whether economically or militarily, they've really been very rhetorical.

"Now, what we have is the prospect of better harmony, but I wouldn't portray it as more than that right now. Today I think we have, and I think this was borne out in Secretary Shultz's comments of two nights ago in Paris, a consensus that we must deal seriously with our security interests as they are affected by economic ties to the East. And in the course of the next six months we expect the study effort to be seriously undertaken and at the end to have established ground rules which will be a much better basis on which to protect our own security interests.

"In the area of arms control, and I'll get to that in a moment, the Allied consultative process has been a very rich one, a very healthy one, and I think apart from agreement which it has reflected with respect to the substance of our positions in START, INF, MFBR, CD, and so forth, that there is through the process a sense of greater Allied cohesion and confidence that we are leading and sharing with them a serious effort at reducing the level, particularly of nuclear weapons.

“In the area of North-South relations, the centerpiece of the administration’s policy is the Caribbean Basin Initiative, basically this microcosm of a global effort to try to rely more heavily on the private sector to foster growth in developing countries, the transfer of expertise, entrepreneurship, technology, so forth. But it is more than rhetorical. This program encompasses, as you know, trade, aid, and investment, one-way free trade. Aid, yes, a very substantial infusion of start-up capital for countries in greatest need, emergency support funds, $350 million. This has been authorized.

“Finally, the investment incentives in the way of tax measure, has been marked up and we have considerable basis for optimism that it will be enacted this year.

“This is a model. This is something the President is extremely committed to. And we enter the new year with a sense of real accomplishment with what we will have on the books in the way of law.

“With respect to peacekeeping, I think the key elements in the past year have been that in the Middle East, in Southern Africa, South Atlantic for that matter, the United States has taken very seriously and invested very heavily, in political terms, in an effort to bring peace to the Middle East and in Southern Africa. In the Middle East the President is basically posing the question to Israel, ‘Is your security better assured by holding onto territory and the apparent prospect of wars every seven or eight years or by reaching an accommodation politically for a stable peace with your neighbors?’ And to the PLO he is posing the question, ‘Does armed struggle enable you to establish your identity or ought you better—would you not be better off to reach an accommodation peacefully?’ The record of the past 12 years, in three serious defeats of the PLO with enormous loss, the President believes, prompts the question in their minds of whether the time has not come to try to accommodate.

“The President’s clear commitment to seeing this process through is unshakable and we anticipate early progress toward the evacuation of all foreign forces in Lebanon and from that to tackle very vigorously the promotion of the September 1st initiative for broadened negotiations in the peace process and an intense effort this coming year.

“But he has set in motion a process to which he is firmly committed.

“In Southern Africa we see the basis for some optimism between ourselves and the contact group. There is an emerging consensus on the basis for independence in Namibia and stability throughout the area.

“The President’s final objective, but of equal importance to any, is his commitment to arms control. Frankly I think for me and this is,

I suppose, gratuitous, but in a year of daily briefings with him it is this recurring theme which is most prominent, even a preoccupation with getting deep reductions in nuclear arsenals of both sides.

“In his Eureka speech in May the President capped a trilogy, if you will, of arms control positions and called for a reduction of warheads by one-third on deployed missiles with a sub-limit on ICBM warheads and a reduction by half of deployed ballistic missiles.

“This proposal has been on the table in Geneva and seriously negotiated by both sides. The INF proposal, initiated in the zero-option speech November 18th of last year, has led to intense talks on both sides, a Soviet position, analysis of it and discussion of it, and we enter the new year with some sense of confidence, surely of commitment from our side, that we can make progress next year in INF.

“These, then, are the principal goals the President set two years ago and where we think we are right now.

“The President today, and there is an interview in progress now, has stressed that basically in the first year his objective was to lay the foundation—the first two years, really—domestically and in foreign affairs, domestically through legislation to restore the economic health of the country, and overseas to establish the foundation of military strength on which to engender renewed confidence by our allies as well as by third countries, and as a foundation from which to enter a very serious effort to solve problems between ourselves and our leading adversary, the Soviet Union, most notably on arms control, and secondly to devote a major investment of time and energy and political capital to the resolution of the disputes in the Middle East and elsewhere.

“In short, the foundation is there and he looks forward to the next two years as requiring the implementation of his principal goals, notably arms control, the Middle East, peacekeeping generally.

“I could carry on but I’m afraid I’ve got little time so it’s probably more worthwhile if I take your questions now.” (Transcript; Reagan Library, European and Soviet Affairs Directorate, NSC Subject File, State of the Union Speech (1 of 4))

129. Memorandum From Robert Sims of the National Security Council Staff to the President's Assistant for National Security Affairs (Clark)¹

Washington, January 4, 1983

SUBJECT

Post-midterm Public Affairs Strategy

Which policy issues will attract prime public attention in the coming year, and what courses of action are most likely to produce the kind of public support we want? Few issues have staying power with the public. By taking actions on those issues to gain and maintain public confidence, we multiply support, generating spill-over ability to get things done in important areas not constantly on the public agenda.

Policymakers usually prefer to identify their principal areas of concern, select the most desirable policy options on the basis of merit, and then seek to generate public support for the chosen options. I am suggesting, instead, that we identify prime items of public interest, select policy options that are consistent with our goals, but select options that are more achievable because we can gain public support.

The six basic goals of the Reagan Administration in national security matters provide a conceptual framework for observations about public affairs strategy:

—To reverse the decline of the United States and restore economic and military strength.

We have done well in reversing the military trends. With continued commitment to the defense budget, this reversal can be maintained. But, lack of economic growth threatens achievement of this goal. The economy is currently the most salient public issue in America. Defense spending is being made a scapegoat for our economic problems—not only by those who are anti-defense, but also by some who should be supporting the President. Defense expenditures are not the cause of our economic problems, and we should not allow that suggestion to go unchallenged.

On the other hand, the past few months have seen a disenchantment with defense programs and leadership. Critics who said two years ago that the Administration had no defense strategy except to throw money at the problem are still saying that. Now, though, even the Wall Street Journal is adopting the same theme.² Complaints about Defense management, including a number directed personally at Secretary Weinberger, have been regular media fare. The perception that something is wrong at Defense, and that by fixing it (i.e., cutting the defense budget) we can solve the nation's economic problems, jeopardizes achievement of our goal of rearming America.

In media-like simplification, White House choices seem to be: (a) voluntarily reduce defense spending, (b) ask Congress to continue defense spending at present levels, and passively leave it to Congress to cut defense, (c) continue at present spending levels, and vigorously support the defense budget.

The public does not want defense cut. There may be concern about how many is being spent, but the public supports the concept of a strong America. Thus, voluntary defense cuts would, in the end, result in loss of public support. Likewise, a passive White House that submits the Defense Department's budget and steps back from it, inviting Congress to cut it, foregoes its leadership role. The public will catch on fast, and the Presidency will be weakened. Conversely, vigorous presentation on a well-scrubbed defense program that continues the strengthening of America makes sense. However, we could benefit from public awareness of serious White House attention to defense management.

The M-X portion of the defense budget is crucial. At the time of the President's November 1982 M-X decision,³ it appeared that we had an outside chance to win in Congress, if the entire Administration got behind it. Administration support was not all-out. We failed.⁴ It was a mistake to underestimate the public affairs component of the decision, and we should not repeat the mistake this spring. As of now, dense pack had almost zero public support.⁵ To gain production approval, we should go back to Congress with something other than an unaltered dense pack basing mode.

In summary, continued progress toward this goal—reversing the military balance—will be affected by our public handling of the defense budget, defense management, and M–X. This analysis suggests that the White House continue strong support of the defense budget, do its best in some dramatic way to reverse the current media perception that we have poor management at Defense, and find a way to finesse the M–X issue.

—To establish a stable basis for US relations with the Soviet Union based on reciprocity and restraint.

—To undertake a vigorous program of arms control.

Enormous progress has been made toward these two goals, and they have become intertwined as public issues. New leadership in the Soviet Union has moved our relations with that country up a notch on the public agenda. We now see keen media interest in relatively minor developments, such as the Andropov reference to his interest in a summit.⁶ Several areas of US–USSR policy, like East–West trade and the Polish situation, will continue to attract public attention, but barring significant developments, the crucial issues that involve highly visible choices for the for the White House in the near term are arms control and summitry.

We have elevated the arms control talks to such a level of media consciousness that unless we reach some agreement this year, our policy will be perceived as either inept or insincere. The zero-zero position on INF has current public support here and in Europe. However, we should not be deluded into thinking it likely that the NATO countries can or will stick with us on zero-zero through the deployment of Pershing II. This is also a dynamite US domestic issue, with nuclear freeze complications. Our historic experience tells us that the Soviets would consider reciprocity on our part a sign of weakness, but this is not widely understood by the public.

One apparent choice in INF is for us to make a new proposal soon after the German elections.⁷ Another option is to stick with zero-zero, try to hold the Alliance together, and withstand criticism in the US.

The policy option likely to gain support from publics here and overseas would be a new INF proposal this spring or summer. Intransigence may be a good negotiating tactic, but an unbending policy will eventually cost public support. The Soviets now have the public affairs initiative. We are on the defensive. We need to regain the initiative. We can coast along in START this year, while our weapons modernization program goes forward, if we come up with an INF proposal that helps offset the well-organized, fear-engendering, anti-nuclear movement in this country and overseas.

Otherwise, we should take a new tact in our public posture on arms control. If we are not going to make a deal, we should begin a process of public downgrading of the talks. We should seriously consider breaking off the talks if we are unable to make progress. The public might understand our not negotiating with the Soviets, but it will not understand dragging out negotiations that seem to be going nowhere.

Summitry should be related to progress in the arms talks or some other major indication of a change for the better in Soviet behavior. Why should RR help Andropov by rushing to meet with him? Andropov will improve his stature through such a meeting. A constructive and overt change in Soviet behavior should be a precondition. But summitry based on progress is highly desirable.

From a public affairs point of view, perhaps the best sequence of events would be an INF agreement, a Reagan-Andropov summit in the US in late 1983 to sign the agreement, then a START agreement signed in the Soviet Union prior to the 1984 election. The lure of this sort of rosy scenario could lead to bad agreements. Domestic politics should not be allowed to force agreements: better to break off the talks and honestly blame the Soviets. Nonetheless, arms control agreements endorsed by Ronald Reagan would, in all likelihood, be overwhelmingly supported by the public and would probably be regarded as the major accomplishment of this term.

—To foster an improved relationship in the context North-South relations with developing countries.

This goal lacks the burning public interest that comes with defense spending and US-Soviet relations. The President's interest in this hemisphere is now well documented. The Caribbean Basin Initiative will be the measure of commitment in the coming year. The Administration should pursue that with vigor. Central America remains a potentially engulfing political issue in this country. A reasonable public affairs goal for the region would seem to be less public attention. Careful selection of policy options is highly desirable, as the national media are waiting to pounce on any significant indication of improper US action. We cannot achieve solid US support for an aggressive policy in the region unless US citizens perceive a real threat to themselves from Cuban or Soviet actions. In this must-win region we have a no-win public affairs situation. Information programs are necessary, but it is unrealistic to try to generate significant US public support for anti-Communist policy initiatives in Central America.

—*To take a vigorous role in peacemaking internationally as a moral responsibility, and on our own self-interest.*⁸

Middle East peacemaking remains a central issue on the US agenda. Successful policy steps could result in the major foreign policy achievement of this Administration. This will continue to be a top news story. Policy steps should continue to reflect White House leadership and take into account the fragility of our public support.

—To establish an improved relationship with our leading Allies.

Secretary Shultz has been portrayed as a miracle-worker in establishing improved relations with our European Allies. This may really be the result of renewed US and Presidential leadership, but it is a public relations plus, no matter who gets the credit. The Secretary will have another opportunity to demonstrate his skill as he travels to Northern Asia. Similarly, the *Williamsburg Summit*⁹ will be watched by the media for signs of improving relationships. Trade policy and world economy will be of interest to segments of the public. White House decisions have to be made about how to handle the Williamsburg Summit, and about Presidential overseas travel. It would seem that, from a public affairs point of view, Japan should be on the President's travel agenda in 1983, and perhaps Korea. Australia and New Zealand would also be popular countries to visit. China is the big question mark, and I am not convinced the President would benefit from a China visit.

⁸ Sims changed the word "on" to "in."

In summary, at mid-term the Reagan Administration has made considerable progress toward its national security goals. A public agenda of unfinished business remains. US-Soviet relations, arms negotiations, the defense budget, and Middle East peacemaking are now, and are likely to remain, the most salient areas of public interest. We need public support for policy success in all those areas. White House involvement is crucial. Otherwise, our agenda is left to chance, or worse, to the bureaucracy. Our strategy should be to focus management attention on these issues, as success in the highly public areas will breed success in other endeavors.

130. Editorial Note

President Ronald Reagan devoted his January 8, 1983, radio address to a discussion of U.S.-Soviet relations. The President spoke at 12:06 p.m. from Camp David, Maryland. Referencing General Secretary of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union Yuri Andropov's ascension to leadership in November 1982, Reagan stated: "There's been much speculation about whether this change could mean a chance to reduce tensions and solve some of the problems between us. No one hopes more than I do that the future will bring improvement in our relations with the Soviets and an era of genuine stability. What could be more important than reducing the danger of confrontation, increasing the prospects for enduring peace, lowering nuclear arsenals, relieving human suffering in Afghanistan, Kampuchea, and elsewhere?"

"With your support, this administration has embarked on an effort to restore our nation's strength, credibility, and clarity of purpose in the world. Our aim has been to ensure that America has the will and the means to deter conflict and to defend the interests of freedom. We've done this for one reason and one reason only—because a strong, respected America is the surest way to preserve the peace and prevent conflict.

“In this effort, we must learn from history. We all experienced the soaring hopes and then plunging disappointment of the 1970’s, when the Soviet response to our unilateral restraint was to accelerate their military buildup, to foment violence in the developing world, to invade neighboring Afghanistan, and to support the repression of Poland.

“The lesson is inescapable. If there are to be better mutual relations, they must result from moderation in Soviet conduct, not just our own good intentions. In recent days, some encouraging words have come out of Moscow. Clearly the Soviets want to appear more responsive and reasonable. But moderate words are convincing only when they’re matched by moderate behavior.

“Now we must see whether they’re genuinely interested in reducing existing tensions. We and our democratic partners eagerly await any serious actions and proposals the Soviets may offer and stand ready to discuss with them serious proposals which can genuinely advance the cause of peace.

“We do not insist that the Soviet Union abandon its standing as a superpower or its legitimate national interests. In fact, we hope that the new leadership in Moscow will come to realize that Soviet interests would be improved by ending the bloodshed in Afghanistan, by showing restraint in the Middle East, by permitting reform and thus promoting stability in Poland, by ending their unequaled military buildup, as we have proposed, by reducing the most dangerous nuclear arms to much lower and equal levels.

“We stand ready to work towards solutions to all outstanding problems. Now, this doesn’t mean that we should neglect our own defenses. That would undercut our ability to maintain peace and jeopardize whatever chance we may have for changing Soviet conduct. But it does mean that we’re always ready to sit down with the Soviets to discuss practical steps that could resolve problems and lead to a more durable and genuine improvement in East-West relations.”

The President then stated that talks would resume in Geneva in February regarding strategic and intermediate-range nuclear forces. He asserted that the U.S. negotiators would “negotiate energetically and in good faith to achieve early agreements providing for reduced and equal levels of forces.” Continuing, the President underscored that one component of the U.S. approach to relations with the Soviet Union consisted of “close consultations with our allies on common political and security issues.” In this vein, Reagan stated, he had asked Vice President George H.W. Bush to travel at the end of January to the Federal Republic of Germany, the Netherlands, Belgium, Switzerland, Italy, France, the United Kingdom, and Vatican

City. In addition, Bush was scheduled to meet with the U.S. arms control negotiating teams in Geneva and attend the meeting of the Committee on Disarmament (CD).

Concluding his address, the President stressed: "So, the new year begins with reason for all of us to hope that if we continue to act firmly and wisely, 1983 can be a time of peaceful progress for America, for our allies, for the people of the U.S.S.R., and for the entire world.

"Till next week, thanks for listening, and God bless you." (Public Papers: Reagan, 1983, Book I, pages 23–25)

131. Action Memorandum From the Assistant Secretary of State for Congressional Relations (Moore) and the Chairman of the Policy Planning Council (Bosworth) to Secretary of State Shultz¹

Washington, January 11, 1983

SUBJECT

Strategy for Foreign Affairs Agenda in the 98th Congress

Issue for Decision

What should be our top foreign policy objectives in the 98th Congress?

Essential Factors

During the first session of the 98th Congress, we will pursue numerous legislative objectives crucial to the President's foreign policy. This memorandum sets out the first-order congressional foreign policy objectives which will require your continuing involvement. These priority issues are drawn from an inventory of legislative objectives (attached),² which was compiled after extensive consultations between H and the regional/functional bureaus. Priortiy Foreign Policy Objecties in 98th Congress

We will pursue our legislative agenda in an environment of severe budgetary austerity and growing political partisanship. You will be in and out of several of the issues enumerated at Tab 1, but your continuing involvement will be required for the following five broad topics:

1. Funding Foreign Policy. This involves security assistance, development aid, defense budgets, base agreements, peace forces (Mideast, possibly southern Africa), not to mention State Department operations. Certain special presidential commitments also are included here, such as the CBI, in which Chairman Rostenkowski has undertaken to move early in the session. (We have taken note of your desire to improve the content and style of our presentations on these subjects and are working on this.)

2. Defense and Arms Control. The success of Administration foreign policy, and of U.S. credibility abroad, will depend on sustaining congressional (and public) support for the President's defense programs and arms control proposals. We face increased pressures for defense cuts (including MX and Pershing II funding), troop reductions in Europe, adoption of the freeze and, perhaps, "quick and dirty" agreements on START, INF or MBFR. Managing all this on the Hill, without sacrificing major U.S. interests, will require your full participation.

3. Mideast. Congressional support will be vital in pursuing the Arab-Israeli peace process and Lebanon negotiation track. In addition, arms sales (Egypt, Israel, possibly Jordan) could become highly contentious. The Lebanon supplemental will be important.

4. International Economics. This is a critical area for which we do not have a comprehensive, coherent policy. On the damage limitation side, we will need to fight hard to head off protectionist legislation (domestic content). We also have some important positive goals (funding INF and multilateral development banks and renewal of Export Administration Act).³ But we need to do all of this within the framework of an integrated response to the issues of international debt, synchronization of recovery in the OECD and major LDCs, OPEC and the softening oil markets, East-West economics and the Williamsburg summit.⁴

⁴ See footnote 9, Document 129.

5. Far East. The two key issues clearly are China policy (including arms sales) and Japan (mainly trade, but also defense policy). You will want to consult with key members before and after your upcoming trip, but there is likely to be continuing interest throughout the year.⁵

Conclusion

As we move into what may be a rather fractious third year, we need to build a more solid and broader political center, in the country and in the Congress, on major Administration policy objectives. Your role will be indispensable in this effort with Congress. (Steve is sending you a related memo on your speech strategy for the next six months, which dovetails substantively with our proposed congressional strategy.)⁶ Once we have your reaction to the basic congressional strategy. Powell will be back with specific proposals.

Recommendation

That you approve the Congressional strategy set out above, with top priority accorded to funding foreign policy, defense and arms control, the Mideast, international economies and the Far East.

The Secretary apologized for being late, explaining he had been called away by the President who was making a short statement on arms control matters to the press.² The U.S. had just made some managerial changes among its arms control negotiators, and the press had put a bad interpretation on the changes.³ So the President had decided Drafted by Wright on January 15; cleared by Newell, Feldman, and Hill. Newell did not initial the memorandum. A typed notation on the first page of the memorandum reads: "Distribution appv by S, 2/18/83." A stamped notation indicates that it was received on February 20 at 2:26 p.m. In telegram 20600 to USUN and the Mission in Geneva, January 22, the Department reported on the meeting. ² The President spoke at 1:35 p.m. in the Briefing Room at the White House. For the text of the President's remarks and a question-and-answer session, see Public Papers: Reagan, 1983, Book I, pp. 50–54.

to make a statement on television to express his determination to achieve a strong arms control agreement.

The Secretary General replied that everyone was happy that the Secretary had been given overall responsibility for arms control matters since these were so important. It was obvious that "our Soviet friends" were making strong efforts to portray themselves as having the initiative in this area. The Secretary General said he himself attached great importance to disarmament, but he was careful always to give the same weight in his public statements to conventional as to nuclear arms since conventional arms were so extremely dangerous.

Secretary Shultz agreed, calling it an important technological fact that conventional arms were now so powerful and so accurate that they were an overwhelming menace. He also noted that in the post-war era no one had died from nuclear arms.

Perez de Cuellar said that his own country, Peru, was buying arms in a wild way. Conventional arms purchases were one of the main reasons for the economic difficulties of the developing countries.

The Secretary stated that one of the tragedies of Cuba's transmittal of arms in Latin America was that historically, despite the violence there, arms transfers had been less prevalent in that region than in others.

Perez de Cuellar said it was his intention to test the many Soviet statements indicating a desire for a solution in Afghanistan. When he had gone to Moscow in September,⁴ for example, Brezhnev had for the first time raised Afghanistan in a public statement, to support "my efforts." In the Prague Declaration, too, there was a special paragraph on Afghanistan mentioning UN efforts.⁵ Therefore, the Secretary General said, it was his responsibility to test Soviet intentions.

At the same time, Perez did not intend to be a screen behind which the Soviets consolidated their hold on Afghanistan. He had sent his own man to the region in this spirit. If there were no constructive response, he intended to tell the Soviets—when he visited them March

28–29 in Moscow—that he was ending his efforts.⁶ He felt it necessary to get down to substance as soon as possible, and he would press the Soviets to this end.

As the Secretary knew, said the Secretary General, the Pakistanis were genuinely interested in a solution. They were burdened with 2½ million refugees, and they had been very forthcoming. Still, he did not know what we could get from the Soviets. He thought Pakistan would be willing to deal with the Afghan Government if there could be some changes in it. He said he had been bold enough to tell Gromyko that the Soviets had to show some changes in the government. Gromyko had objected, but he, the Secretary General, had made the necessary point. It would not be easy for the Soviets to effect such a change in the Karmal Government. The opposition was divided into lots of rebel groups. The situation was different from that in Kampuchea, where there was now a coalition to deal with. At any rate, the Soviets must consider getting rid of Karmal and getting a different facade. The Secretary General concluded that he would not let himself be used to play games. He added that he was prepared to ask Diego Cordovez to come to Washington to discuss the results of his meetings in Islamabad when those had ended.

The Secretary asked about Central America and what the Secretary General thought was going on there.

The Secretary General said he realized the U.S. was in a difficult position, with the situation getting worse and worse. Nicaragua would soon be under the complete control of the communist wing of the Sandinistas. Something had to be done.

As he had told the President, however, the Nicaraguans did not now intend to try to make a case in the Security Council, and that was a positive element. Moreover, last week's Panama Communique (on the situation in Central America) was fairly reasonable.⁷ It opposed intervention in the internal affairs of Latin American countries, which was unobjectionable. At the same time, he repeated, the Sandinistas were taking over and that was very negative. Costa Rica and El Salvador had to defend themselves—to stop infiltration from Nicaragua and intervention by Nicaragua in their affairs.

⁶ Following the two days of talks with Andropov and Gromyko in Moscow, Pérez de Cuellar reported that the talks "have left him feeling 'encouraged' about prospects for resolving the Afghanistan problem." (Dusko Doder, "U.N. Leader 'Encouraged' by Talks in Moscow About Afghanistan," Washington Post, March 30, 1983, p. A18)

But it was hard to say how to do this. Perez said he knew the Nicaraguan Foreign Minister⁸ well. He was a priest, and the Secretary General sometimes chided him by saying he blessed with the left hand. He had told the Foreign Minister during their last meeting that now that Nicaragua was on the Security Council, it had the opportunity to show it was truly non-aligned and not under anyone's control. Perez repeated that he did not see what could be done to check Nicaragua's activities but something must be.

In El Salvador, the Secretary General continued, the situation had improved quite a lot. The Government was attacking the real source of its difficulties, the social and economic structure of the country. This was the only way to counteract communist infiltration.

The Secretary General noted that Grenada and Suriname were also threatened.

So far as the OAS was concerned, said Perez, he tried to respect its jurisdiction. The OAS did not, however, want to deal with Nicaragua but rather to pass the problem to the UN.

Bolivia's decision to resume relations with Cuba, said the Secretary General, had been unexpected. Perez had warned the President of Bolivia⁹ of the risks here, reminding him that Che Guevara had gone to Bolivia because of its political importance. It would be good if other Latin American nations warned Bolivia on this score as well. Perez said he was dining tonight with the Peruvian Prime Minister,¹⁰ a very sensible man, and would speak to him on the subject.

Secretary Shultz asked whether there was anything the United States should be doing in the world that we were not.

Perez replied that the UN provided the United States with a useful mechanism for resolving conflicts, and that the U.S. had a special responsibility in the UN because it was the UN's founder and creator. (NOTE: At this point, the other participants entered the room.) Turning to those who had just arrived, the Secretary General said he was trying to sell "my commodity" (i.e., the UN) to Secretary Shultz. Perez continued that the United States should take more advantage of the UN. He said he was a completely independent Secretary General who would play a full role in acting out his prerogatives and responsibilities. He wanted to prevent differences from becoming conflicts. Under Article 99, the Secretary General could bring to the Security Council matters which threatened peace, but this was not enough.¹¹

The Secretary replied that Perez's remarks were most welcome. At times, he said, we had thought that what we needed was a ceasefire from UN resolutions. During the recent period of troubles in the Mid-East, there had been two Security Council resolutions a day and it was distracting. We wanted to support the UN. We had tried to send good people there, and we had at the moment an outstanding representative, but we felt we must say what we believed and not go along with what we often thought was nonsense. That was a considered judgment on our part. We hoped the UN would respect our stance just as we respected the Secretary General's own candid statements.

Another concern of ours, said the Secretary, at which we were very upset, was the politicization of entities whose mission was technical. The outstanding example was the IAEA, which did critical work. A politicized agency would be worse than no agency at all. The Secretary hoped that the IAEA situation was coming together, and said he expected that it was. We would be very firm on that. He thought it was healthy for the UN to be brought up a bit short on these things. The Secretary concluded that we were much in support of the UN and that the positions we took against the presumed majority were in reality supportive of the UN as an institution.

Perez replied that it would be wrong to give the impression that relations between the U.S. and the UN were not good. If one looked at it closely, there was no problem. It was wrong to think that the UN majority was automatically against the U.S., as witnessed the votes on Israel's expulsion, Puerto Rico, Afghanistan and Kampuchea. It was only on Mid-East questions that the majority stuck together against U.S. positions.

Ambassador Kirkpatrick added that South Africa was another such issue.

Perez insisted that the examples he had cited showed that the General Assembly supported the United States in many instances. It was very harmful to spread the idea that there was a quarrel between us. It hurt the United States, and it made it seem like the UN was becoming weaker and weaker. The United States was a key country. The best way for the U.S. to support the UN was to use it as a mechanism to solve disputes. It was sometimes in the interests of big powers to take advantage of the UN. "In a way it protects you."

The Secretary General assured the Secretary that the UN was always ready to help; on Namibia, for example, the UN was, as it were, behind the door waiting for the parties to agree. Perez said he would visit Africa soon and wanted to give nations there reason for hope.¹² He would be pleased in this regard to convey to the Africans the views of the Contact Group nations. Raising his voice slightly, Perez said he was “so worried” about Namibia. He feared Southern Africa would become another Middle East, and he said that a solution in Namibia would be a tremendous step in the region.

¹¹ Reference is to Article 99 of the UN Charter, which permits the Secretary-General to bring to the attention of the Security Council any matter which in his opinion might threaten the maintenance of international peace and security.

The Secretary assured Perez of the United States’ willingness to appropriate large sums of money to enact the UN plan if it came into being. From talking with the South Africans and others, however, the former were not going to go along with a settlement as long as the Cubans, which they regarded as Russians, were sitting next door. So there must be some program for getting the Cubans out. That was only reality. The Secretary said it was our impression that the last meeting between the South Africans and the Angolans had been very good. We had thought we were heading for a solution in the late fall, but that did not prove to be the case. But we were not giving up.

The Secretary said that in Namibia and all around the world we were trying to be constructive—not to create problems but to solve them. Many problems were, however, being created for us, and we got exhausted following them around. One way in which we were being constructive was in coming to the aid of debtor nations in South America and holding the economic system in some coherence. The IMF had been superb on this score. The Secretary General could, therefore, feel assured that we were trying to be helpful and constructive.

Perez raised Iran/Iraq. The Secretary said we had little ability to do things there although we did have some contact with Iraq. Perez said he thought that two main points needed working on: first, the status of the 1975 Algiers Treaty,¹³ and secondly, the problem of reparations, which was very important for Iran. Prime Minister Olaf Palme¹⁴ had been kind enough to retain his Iran/Iraq brief although, at this stage, Perez thought it wise not to send him there since there was nothing he could do. Today, Palme was receiving a visit from the Foreign Minister of Algeria.¹⁵ Algeria was trying to mediate, and the two were assessing

At a news conference following a meeting with Mugabe on February 6, Pérez de Cuellar advocated “a ‘prompt solution’ to the problem of independence for South-West Africa.” (“U.N. the situation. Perez himself had contracted the President of Algeria.¹⁶ The Algerians saw reparations as the main problem.

Perez himself wanted to mention two problems. First, there was the danger of an Iraqi attack on Kharg Island, which would expand the conflict. Perez said he had been trying to warn Iraq away from this. Secondly, Chirac had told Perez in New York that he was worried about Israeli aid to Iran, which he said was sizeable.

Secretary Shultz said that Chirac had mentioned this to him to well.¹⁷ Chirac had said that Israeli Defense Minister Sharon had announced a $300 million arms contract only a few weeks ago. The Secretary did not think this was correct but promised to check.

Ambassador Kirkpatrick said she had raised this point with Shamir a few weeks ago, and he said there had been no arms transactions with Iran for some time.

The Secretary said that Israel's help to Iran had begun when Iraq was the aggressor. Since the tables had turned, however, he thought that Israel had not done much in this regard, but he would check.

Turning to the Mid-East, Perez said he was happy that Lebanon and Israel had agreed on an agenda. Regarding a UN role, "We are always ready." He expected the Security Council to agree to a UNIFIL extension. Brian Urquhart had just returned from the area, where he had contacted the parties.¹⁸ Urquhart said that that included Morrie Draper.

The Secretary said that the extension of the UNIFIL mandate was the right thing to do. The negotiations now seemed to be moving. We were pressuring the parties forward. When a plan for Israeli withdrawal had been agreed, that would still leave Syria and the PLO. Syria had made a forthcoming statement, but the Secretary did not know whether they would leave, and Israel would not depart without a commitment from the other two. If all three left, that would be a good omen since it

¹⁶ Chadli Bendjedid.

¹⁷ Chirac met with Shultz in Washington on January 13. In telegram 18878 to Paris, January 21, the Department summarized the meeting: "In response to Chirac's request Secretary reviewed situation in Lebanon and Middle East. Chirac expressed deep concern about Iran-Iraq war. He urged U.S. make effort to prevent Israel from supplying arms to Iran. He also said Saddam Husayn would welcome contacts with the U.S. and is potentially supportive of the Reagan peace initiative. The Secretary noted the fact that Iraq harbors terrorists which makes improvement in U.S.-Iraq relations difficult. Chirac and the Secretary also exchanged views on international economic developments. Chirac expressed pessimism about French economy." (Department of State, Central Foreign Policy File, Electronic Telegrams, [no N number]) would demonstrate to the Arabs that their suspicion that Israel would refuse to depart was wrong. With regard to UNIFIL a new mission for it would evolve if things progressed, and there was no sense in trying to define it now.

As the meeting came to a close, Ambassador Kirkpatrick said there was serious concern at high levels in our Government on two personnel matters. They were important because they bore on the question of confidence. One concerned Mr. Dneprovsky, whom all the world knew was a KGB agent and who we understood was being extended in his position for another three years. The other was Undersecretary General Wyzner, who we understood was a candidate for Chairman of the Appointments and Promotions Board. Secretary Shultz said that the Wyzner job did seem to be an important one.

Perez said there must be some mistake. The person in line for that job as far as he knew was Margaret Anatee. In any case, Mr. Wyzner had only been with the UN three months, and thus could never be appointed to such a job. With regard to Dneprovsky, the Secretary General said he did not think any decision had been taken. William Buffum interjected that he thought that it had.

SUBJECT

Africa Food Crisis

PARTICIPANTS

The Secretary
Senator Jack Danforth (R., MO.)
Alvin Drischler (Congressional Relations)
Frank G. Wisner (Bureau of African Affairs)

Senator Danforth opened the conversation by informing the Secretary that he wishes to visit Africa in late March, together with several other Senators to involve themselves in Africa's food crisis and to think through a strategy to deal with African hunger.² Danforth reminded the Secretary of his involvement in a similar humanitarian undertaking in 1979 when he involved himself in the Cambodia refugee and food crisis.³ Africa's problem is more deeply rooted and requires a long term strategy. The United States should be involved and Danforth wishes to spearhead American involvement. The United States should be committed since dealing with the food problem will save lives, is consonant with U.S. ideals, would improve African and third world perceptions of the United States and would benefit the President domestically.

¹Source: Reagan Library, George Shultz Papers, Official Memoranda (01/17/1983); NLR-775-27A-17-6-7. Limited Official Use. Drafted by Wisner; cleared by Klosson and Hill. The stamped date "FEB 14 1983" is in the top right-hand corner of the memorandum.

Danforth added it is also important to deal with domestic hunger. The Secretary asked him if he had a domestic program, like the food stamp program, in mind.⁴ Danforth replied he favored private sector voluntarism and cited the recent example of General Motors, matching gifts of food for hungry Americans with corporate funds.⁵ Danforth admitted he was treading on unknown ground but he hoped the Secretary would consider the wisdom of putting the African food crisis ²Danforth's proposed trip to Africa that March did not take place. In telegram 60589 to Ouagadougou, March 4, the Department indicated that Danforth "has cancelled his trip to Africa proposed for the upcoming congressional recess." (Department of State, Central Foreign Policy File, Electronic Telegrams, D830122–0714) Danforth did travel to Africa to investigate famine conditions in January 1984. In telegram 347023 to multiple African diplomatic and consular posts, December 7, 1983, Lyman indicated that Danforth planned to travel to Africa January 4–18, 1984, and visit Somalia, Kenya, Mauritania, and Mozambique. (Department of State, Central Foreign Policy File, Electronic Telegrams, D830721–0135) Upon his return, Danforth recommended "that the administration spend $200 million in additional aid to combat food shortages" in Africa; the President directed McPherson to expedite emergency food shipments to Africa. (Storer Rowley, "Quick food aid ordered for 20 nations," Chicago Tribune, January 20, 1984, p. 16) Also see footnote 14, Document 192.

³Danforth and Senators Max Baucus (D–Montana) and James Sasser (D–Tennessee) traveled to Thailand and Kampuchea in late October 1979, at the request of President Carter, Senate Majority Leader Robert Byrd, and Senate Minority Leader Howard Baker, in order to visit refugee camps and also convince Vietnamese-supported Kampuchean officials to allow trucks from Thailand to deliver food aid to starving Kampuchean. At a news conference in Phnom Penh on October 24, Danforth said "There is absolutely no reason why hundreds of thousands of people should be condemned to their death because some central committee doesn't act." (Henry Kamm, "Senators Press Aid On Wary Cambodia: Regime Tells 3 Visiting Americans It Will Consider Offer of Large Supplies of Food Relief," New York Times, October 25, 1979, p. A5) Documentation on the visit and U.S. efforts to provide additional relief is in Foreign Relations, 1977–1980, vol. XXII, Southeast Asia and the Pacific.

⁵On January 6, General Motors (GM) and the United Automobile Workers of America (UAW) announced a nationwide food drive to last 8 weeks. GM had designated $2 million in matching funds for contributions by its employees. ("G.M. and Auto Union Seek Food for Needy," New York Times, January 9, 1983, p. A24) on the US-Soviet strategic agenda. Could funds saved from the retirement of a missile system be put in a Soviet-American trust fund for food development? Danforth paused and then completed his remarks with the observation that he did not want to become involved with African food crisis without the support of the administration or without having worked out a relationship with the administration.

The Secretary thanked Danforth for his thoughtful remarks and allowed he shared the Senator's view that the African problem is a long term one—an issue which requires careful planning. Africa is not Southeast Asia where progress would come quickly in the absence of war. Food production is a good priority for Africa. Helping in this field appeals to our purposes and ideals; it saves lives, especially those of children. The Secretary assured Danforth we are ready to work with him; there is no divergence of views on the importance of the issue.

Our agenda for Africa is a long and important one. We are seeking independence for Namibia and peace in Angola. We are establishing ties with pro-Soviet Mozambique and drawing it away from the Soviet Union. We have an active diplomatic effort but we do not have the resources we need to get the job done. Africa's food requirement is enormous and our ability to generate resources is limited. We need help in the Congress and greater understanding of what we require to reach our objectives. We have come close to striking out with the recent heavily earmarked supplemental.

Danforth noted how generously the Congress had responded to Cambodia. The Secretary warned that the issues are different. Aid must be given in this instance in a manner that does not undercut local food production. Our approach must be carefully planned and provide incentives. Danforth agreed that the strategy must be smart but he doubted AID would produce such an approach. He and Senator Bellmon⁶ had been badly let down in Egypt by AID. Danforth wanted the Secretary to understand he was willing to involve himself on a sustained basis. He regards the Africa food crisis as a "mission". He hoped to start by traveling to Africa but would need the Secretary's help in identifying a "coach". The Secretary promised our support but urged Danforth to look also to AID's Pete McPherson who is very thoughtful and has good ideas.

Danforth pledged he would be a catalyst for a serious program but he would need logistical support for his eight day trip, a good itinerary and an able advisor. The Secretary promised we would find someone "who cares".

⁶ Former Senator Henry L. Bellmon (R-Oklahoma), who served in the Senate until January 3, 1981. Bellmon was Governor of Oklahoma during the 1980s.

(Following the meeting, Frank Wisner called Danforth to propose AF Deputy Assistant Secretary Lyman serve as the Senator's advisor. Danforth agreed).

MEETING BETWEEN PRESIDENT REAGAN AND PM NAKASONE CABINET ROOM

The President said he had emerged from his private meeting with Prime Minister Nakasone² with a sense of positive momentum in solving our outstanding disputes, particularly in regard to trade and defense. He and the Prime Minister had agreed that we had a strong relationship with great responsibility for the world economy and for world recovery, and was gratified to have the Prime Minister's personal support.

Asked to summarize the status of our bilateral relations, Secretary Shultz said that United States-Japanese relations were of the utmost importance, whether they concerned economic affairs, strategic affairs, business affairs, or financial affairs. For example, the reason the Secretary of the Treasury and the Finance Minister were not at the meeting was because they were discussing subjects of international weight in Paris.³ Our bilateral defense relationships were fundamental. In view of the strength and size of the Japanese economy, our two nations together had to take joint responsibility not only for the world economy but for support of the free-trading system, the strategic system, and the values we shared. To do this effectively we needed to stress bilateral problems.

Secretary Shultz said that when he greeted the Prime Minister the day before, he had been attending a meeting in the Cabinet Room, where he left the President surrounded by representatives of business and labor from all over the United States who were communicating their concerns to the President.⁴ We had to identify our concerns and talk them through. We were encouraged by the strength with which the Prime Minister had addressed these issues; we had to look at many problems. In the defense area, some steps had been taken, but we also had to compare what had been accomplished with the missions and goals we had set out to achieve.

Trade and defense were the central elements of our bilateral relationship, but beyond that we shared many interests in the world, for example our relationship with China, and the promotion of world peace.

The President said that there was one issue he had not had a chance to address with the Prime Minister as yet, law of the sea. The Prime Minister should know that we had been in touch with mining groups, who were interested in a consortium approach. If we worked outside the Convention, we should be able to work out a satisfactory approach to deep-sea-bed mining.

Secretary Block said that as the Prime Minister was aware, there was a considerable amount of concern about selling agriculture commodities to Japan. The United States appreciated the importance of the Japanese market for American agricultural products which approach 7 billion dollars, and the United States was a reliable supplier. Nevertheless, we were concerned about trade barriers to some products, the ⁴ The meeting took place in the Cabinet Room on January 17 from 2:04 until 3:08 p.m. (Reagan Library, President's Daily Diary) In his personal diary entry for January 17, the President wrote: "—Issues lunch and then a meeting with a dozen top C.E.O.s from Ford, Caterpillar, U.S. Steel etc. plus heads of Farm Bureau & Nat. Cattlemen. This too was a solid discussion of Japans gimmicks to pretend free trade but practice protectionism. This Nakasone meeting is going to be a make or break one." (Brinkley, ed., The Reagan Diaries, vol. I, January 1981–October 1985, p. 189) Shultz met with Nakasone that afternoon from 3:10 until 3:45 p.m. in Suite 1531 at the Madison Hotel. A draft memorandum of conversation is in the Reagan Library, Executive Secretariat, NSC Subject File, Memorandums of Conversation—President Reagan (12/27/1982–1/31/1983). most serious of these being citrus and beef, which were the focus of a good deal of political pressure. These had become a symbol for farmers in the United States, who might have Datsun pickup trucks and Sony TV sets, but could not sell citrus or beef. We were prepared to resume talks on these quotas as soon as it was apparent there were some possibilities of substantial progress.

Prime Minister Nakasone said he would like to address matters of principle, leaving details to the Foreign Minister. As he had told the President in their private meeting, our two countries on opposite sides of the Pacific shared a destiny and must discharge their responsibilities in accordance with their strength. He intended to observe the Joint Communique that the President and Prime Minister Suzuki had signed in 1981.⁵ While there were frictions in regard to defense problems and trade, we shared the same concepts, and our differences applied to the details of solutions. We had to continue to consult closely. The Prime Minister said that the President came from California and knew the Pacific Region. The United States also faced the Atlantic, and therefore was a two-ocean nation, but for Japan there was just the Pacific. As a Pacific nation, Japan could contribute to peace in that region; thus far, Japan and the United States were cooperating on economic measures directed at the Soviet Union, in regard to GATT, and in assisting the LDCs with their debt problems. This was good cooperation, which he wanted to continue whole-heartedly and sincerely. It was especially important, as the President had said, for both countries to preserve the free-trading system. If protectionism grew, we would repeat the experience of the 1930s. For that reason, his cabinet was making every effort to address trade and defense issues, not in response to US influence, but for Japan's own sake, to discharge its own responsibilities.

Prime Minister Nakasone said the main task of his administration was to build a Japan open to the world; he wanted to guide and persuade the Japanese people toward this end. His predecessors had, of course, made their utmost efforts to behave as equal partners of the United States, but speaking frankly there were shortcomings in their performance in US eyes. The Prime Minister said that when he took office, his cabinet had many debts to repay; they could not be all repaid at once, but he would try. He and the President had both devoted their lives to politics, and he was sure they shared the view that they had to take party strategy into account. The President would understand that in order to pay debts, he had to have the support of his cabinet.

Prime Minister Nakasone said he was aware of the President's concern about law of the sea. His government had postponed signing the Convention at the end of last year at the behest of Ambassador Rumsfeld. However, after careful consideration, the government had decided that Japan was associated with LDC group for LOS purposes, and had to look to its relationship with the LDC's. There were problems with deep-sea mining, but the other areas of the Convention brought much progress. His personal view was that once the Convention was in force, it would be possible to solve problems. As it stood now, it was as if nations were competing to occupy territory on the surface of the moon. The Prime Minister promised to consider the President's view on LOS when he returned to Japan, but he had just expressed his own opinion.

Minister Abe said that it was just 60 days since the Nakasone government came to power, but more than any other government it had been trying to make clear that relations with the United States were the most important for Japan. The Nakasone government was making every effort to solve United States-Japan problems. As Secretary Shultz had noted, the biggest issue was trade. In order to maintain and defend the free-trading system, the Japanese government was trying to discharge its responsibilities. In reducing tariffs on agriculture and manufactured goods, it had tried its best to meet the requests of Congress and other groups; tobacco for example, had been reduced by 15 percent, chocolate had been reduced appreciably, and tariffs on 27 other manufactured items had been reduced or eliminated. There was strong domestic opposition to these moves on the part of the industries affected, as well as within the LDP, but the Prime Minister had decided to accept the risk.

Prime Minister Nakasone said that Secretary Block had referred to beef and citrus. He was aware of the strong demand made by the United States in regard to these items in December, but Japanese farmers had become agitated. When he decided to reduce the tobacco tariff and expand the number of outlets for foreign tobacco products, he did so without obtaining the consensus of the Liberal Democratic Party. There was much criticism on the grounds that he was supposed to be a leader, and had no mandate to be a dictator. The Prime Minister said that just before his departure, beef and citrus farmers had presented him with a petition signed by about 9 million persons to make no concessions while in Washington, and 10,000 farmers had turned out for a demonstration. It was wise for both sides to let these issues cool off a while and then let the experts deal with quotas when they expired.

The Prime Minister said that when he went to Korea,⁶ President Chun had asked him to convey to the President his request that the President work to maintain the free-trading system. He also would like to convey the thought suggested by Prime Minister Trudeau in Tokyo,⁷ just before Nakasone left for Washington, that at the Williamsburg Summit⁸ it might be a good idea for Trudeau, the President, and himself to get together and discuss Pacific problems, as long as it could be done in a way that would not provoke the Europeans.

US-Soviet Relations in 1983

(Reagan Library, George Shultz Papers, 1982–83 US-Soviets Background Info) In his memoir, Shultz recalled the memorandum's reception: "Shortly after my paper reached the White House, Bud McFarlane let me know that the NSC staff over there was 'fly specking' it. 'There are so many ideologues around here that they are picking it to pieces,' he said." (Shultz, Turmoil and Triumph, p. 162) activism by using an intensified dialogue with Moscow to test whether an improvement in the US-Soviet relationship is possible. Even if no improvement ultimately takes place, the dialogue itself would strengthen our ability to manage the relationship and keep the diplomatic initiative in our hands.

As we proceed, we must keep in mind that our challenge is not to launch a bold, new initiative, but to build on the good beginning we have made in the patient, steady, yet creative management of a long-term adversarial relationship with the Soviet Union. I look forward to an early opportunity to discuss this topic with you in greater detail.

Enduring Features of US-Soviet Competition: The US-Soviet competition has deep roots in the fundamentally different nature of the two societies and in Moscow's readiness to use its growing military power in ways that threaten our security. Thus there is no realistic scenario for a breakthrough to amicable relations with the Soviet Union.

To be sure, the Soviet system is beset by serious weaknesses. But it would be a mistake to assume that the Soviet capacity for competition with us will diminish at any time during your Presidency. While recognizing the adversarial nature of our relationship with Moscow, we must not rule out the possibility that firm U.S. policies could help induce the kind of changes in Soviet behavior that would make an improvement in relations possible.

We have made considerable progress toward a more effective Soviet policy through our long-term rearmament program, actions to revitalize our Alliances, a new ideological offensive on behalf of our fundamental values, and arms control proposals that have made clear our seriousness in the search for peace.

The Challenge of US-Soviet Relations in 1983: There is already evidence of greater foreign policy energy and sophistication under Andropov, and the Soviets will clearly be on the offensive in 1983. In Europe, we can expect that the Soviets will make the fullest possible use of Western hopes raised by the succession to redouble their appeals to Western publics on issues such as INF. In Asia, Moscow will use renewed talks with the Chinese to press its diplomatic offensive, while hinting at new flexibility on Afghanistan. I believe that we can best preempt this increased Soviet maneuvering with increased diplomatic and public activism of our own, including through an intensified dialogue with Moscow. If this dialogue does not result in improved US-Soviet relations, the onus will rest clearly on Moscow; if it leads to actual improvement, all the better.

Preconditions for Effective Dialogue: To proceed with an intensified dialogue while protecting our security interests, we need to fulfill the following preconditions: (1) continued rebuilding of American economic and military strength; (2) continued revitalization of our Alliances; (3) stabilization of relations with China; (4) continued regional peace-keeping efforts (Middle East and CBI); and (5) continued competition in ideas.

The Purposes of Intensified US-Soviet Dialogue: Such a dialogue could serve our interests by: (1) probing for new Soviet flexibility (get Andropov to put his money where his mouth is); (2) controlling events (reaffirming our determination to play a central role on all issues while preventing opening of gaps between us and our Allies); (3) maintaining Allied and domestic support for our policy in the face of a redoubled Soviet “peace offensive”.

Substance of the Dialogue: As we intensify dialogue, it is neither necessary nor advisable to abandon the policy framework we have established. We must continue to insist that US-Soviet dialogue address the full range of our concerns about Soviet behavior: the military buildup, international expansionism, and human rights violations. We must be prepared for evolution of our substantive positions in the give and take of negotiations, but we must not lower our basic requirements for improved US-Soviet relations.

A. Arms Control: We must not abandon the high standards we have set for potential agreements—real reductions, equality in the important measures of military capability, verifiability, and enhanced stability. We must at the same time win the battle for public opinion by making clear that it is the USSR, not the U.S., that is impeding progress toward agreements.

Our most formidable arms control challenge will be in INF: at stake is whether or not we can sustain the integrity and vitality of the Western Alliance. In START, we should hold firm on the conceptual framework of our approach, including substantial reductions and warheads as the principal unit of account. We must negotiate seriously, taking as the point of departure the apparent Soviet willingness to accept the principle of reductions.

B. Regional Issues: The fact that we have engaged Moscow on regional issues—Afghanistan and southern Africa—positions us to sustain diplomatic pressure and exploit whatever opportunities may emerge in the context of the Soviet political process this year. Given the many signals we have heard on Afghanistan, we should test Soviet intentions by another round of our bilateral talks, and possibly by tabling a bold framework for a comprehensive settlement.

We must also deal effectively with the Soviet “Asian offensive” by adding substance to the US-PRC dialogue and holding firm on our requirements for a Kampuchean settlement. This will be one of the objectives of my China trip.³

On other issues, we may wish to renew bilateral discussions with Moscow on Namibia/Angola to press for Cuban troop withdrawal. In some cases, we may need to reinforce warnings about possible unacceptable Soviet behavior in the Third World, such as delivery of MiGs to Nicaragua. In the Middle East, we want to continue to avoid dialogue that could help Moscow regain a role in the peace process.

C. Human Rights and Western Values: We must continue to seek improvement in Soviet behavior: relief of prisoners of conscience, resolution of divided-family cases and the Pentecostalist situation,⁴ and a significant increase in Jewish emigration. Our focus should be on private diplomacy leading to results, not counterproductive public embarrassment of Moscow. We must also press our democracy offensive and ensure that human rights remains a major component of our policy toward Poland and in the CSCE context.

D. Economic Relations: Any steps we take must not contribute to Soviet military power, subsidize the Soviet economy, or undercut our efforts to develop a new framework for East-West economic relations. We must also manage domestic pressures for increased trade so that the timing of any steps we take is geared to our overall US-Soviet strategy. A possible mechanism for managing these pressures would be to restore government-to-government economic contacts through a session of the Joint Commercial Commission (JCC).

E. Bilateral Relations: Small steps have a modest but real role to play in the relationship, and we should seek opportunities to use them. We should be careful to ensure that benefit is mutual and reciprocal and that our actions advance our objective of broadening access to Soviet society. We could implement Charlie Wick's suggestion to negotiate a new umbrella cultural agreement; this would prevent Soviet cultural groups from making their own arrangements with U.S. sponsors, while denying us reciprocal access to the USSR.

⁴ Reference is to seven Russian Pentecostals, who had sought refuge at the U.S. Embassy in Moscow in June 1978 and were seeking permission from Soviet authorities for themselves and their families to emigrate from the Soviet Union. One Pentecostalist—Lidia Vashchenko—had been allowed to leave the Embassy to seek medical care following a hunger strike and had returned to her hometown in January 1982. Ultimately, the remaining Pentecostals would depart the Embassy on April 12, 1983. Documentation on the Pentecostals is in Foreign Relations, 1981-1988, vol. IV, Soviet Union, January 1983-March 1985, Documents 10, 12, 26, 34, and 36.

The Process of Dialogue: We should begin to put in place the building blocks for a productive summit, but without committing ourselves prematurely. Four levels of dialogue should be considered:

—Summitry: The dialogue process should be constructed to lead to a summit if relations warrant, but without initially defining a summit as the only possible outcome. Should we later decide on a US-Soviet summit, you should probably meet with the Chinese first.

—Ministerial-Level Contacts: We could consider another meeting between Gromyko and me, possibly in Moscow if a meeting with Andropov could be guaranteed. Another option would be a neutral site. We might also consider a possible Weinberger-Ustinov meeting.

—Dialogue through Ambassadors: We should make maximum use of both Dobrynin and Art Hartman, and possibly try to regularize their access to Gromyko and me. We might also recall Art for consultations this spring and send him back with a message from you to Andropov.

—Dialogue between “Departments and Desks”: We could accept Dobrynin’s proposal of intensified dialogue between specialists on US-Soviet relations from the State Department and the Soviet MFA.

Conclusion: In sum, 1983 will be a year of new challenges and opportunities in our relations with the Soviet Union. We have in place a sound policy, which gives us the foundation for an intensified dialogue with Moscow along the lines I have described. Such a dialogue would protect our security interests while giving the Soviets incentives to address our concerns—as long as we do not waver on the essentials of the policy approach we have established over the past two years. The Soviets may ultimately prove unwilling to satisfy our criteria for an improvement in the relationship. If so, we will nonetheless have done our part, and the responsibility for continued tensions will rest squarely with Moscow.

Your Trip to Europe²

I. Setting

You are visiting Europe in the opening months of the most important year for the Alliance of the last decade and perhaps for the decade to come. The public debate over the deployment of U.S. INF missiles has taken on a significance which transcends the already substantial military importance of the 1979 "dual track" decision. It has become more than anything a debate about the nature of Europe's security arrangements, Europe's ties with the United States, and its relations with the Soviet Union. The outcome will affect the nature of the Alliance and the position of the United States as the leader of the Western coalition for many years to come.

During my own trip to Europe last month³ I was impressed by the enduring strength of our trans-Atlantic ties and the commitment of the Europeans to our Alliance. Your visit nevertheless takes place when speculation about prospects for U.S.-Soviet relations and arms control negotiations has been stimulated by the passing of Brezhnev, the more dynamic leadership of Andropov, and recent press attention to alleged internal Washington differences over arms control policy. These issues are being examined by the Europeans against a more fundamental set of uncertainties.

- The Europeans wonder about the durability of the U.S. security commitment and are worried that we may not have the will and capacity to provide for their security over the long haul.
- On the other hand, Europeans also worry about the steadiness of U.S. policy and fear that overemphasis on the military elements of security may actually increase the risk of war.
- The Europeans have begun to question whether we have set realistic arms control objectives, and to express doubts about our commitment to achieve meaningful agreements.
- Finally, they are concerned that we may not consult them fully and take their interests into account as we develop our policies.

None of these fears is new. All of them are to some extent inherent in the trans-Atlantic relationship and Europe's fundamental security dependence on us. Moreover, they are mirrored in the U.S., by concerns about Europe's economic ability and political will to meet its defense responsibilities. European fears have been exacerbated in recent years, however, by Western economic difficulties and the feeling of insecurity which these generate, and by growing Soviet military power which the West has failed to match.

Sources of Europeans Anxiety

Over the past decade, the growth of Soviet power—its conventional buildup, the achievement of nuclear parity and of significant advantage in some areas—has led many on both sides of the Atlantic to question the ability of NATO to provide for Europe long-term security. It has led to the questioning as well of U.S. will to engage our strategic forces in the defense of Europe and of the credibility of NATO's strategy of forward defense and flexible response. These issues are much on the minds of European elites. Congressional opposition to NATO-related defense programs, while not representative of majority opinion in this country, is of great concern to Europeans, and uncertainties about MX and the growth of the nuclear freeze movement in the United States naturally feed these concerns.

Andropov in his few short months in office has succeeded in establishing an image as a reasonable leader with positive ideas for improving East-West relations. Europeans by no means take these at face value, and they recognize Soviet offers are self-serving. But European governments want to appear to be open to improvement in relations with the Soviet Union and their publics very much hope such improvement is possible.

Anxiety over the course of East-West relations is particularly reflected in concerns over the arms control negotiations. For over a decade Europeans were essentially content to follow our lead in the arms control area. They recognize that the results of these earlier efforts have been disappointing. There is no clear European alternative to our current approach. Yet it has become increasingly difficult to achieve resolute European support for our arms control policies.

Europeans are always concerned that their voice may not be given sufficient weight in Washington and that decisions are being made without full consideration of their interests. This traditional, generalized preoccupation with consultations has been greatly focused and intensified by the other uncertainties which characterize our relationship today, and by the depth of concern about our current agenda of issues, particularly arms control and East-West relations.

Enduring Alliance Strengths

At the same time, we should not allow realistic assessment of the challenge we face this year to lead us to pessimism. During my recent trip to Europe the concerns of the leaders with whom I met were more than offset by the depth of their commitment to the Alliance, the mutual appreciation of the enduring ties that bind us together, and the strong will to cooperate in the pursuit of shared objectives. These basic strengths have seen us through hard times in the past and provide a sound basis for success in this difficult year.

—The vitality of the Alliance is demonstrated by the vigor of our internal debate, as well as by three decades of effective effort to provide for our common security.

—The habit of cooperation, based on shared history and culture and a common world view, is deeply ingrained and highly valued. This was impressed on me again and again during my December trip, at NATO, with the EC Commission, and in every capital which I visited.

—We share a common appreciation of the Soviet threat and dedication to take those steps necessary to respond to it.

—There is firm recognition that without Soviet adherence to the basic principles of civilized international conduct we will have no choice but to continue to give attention to our defenses and treat Soviet protestations of good intentions with great caution.

II. Objectives

In your private and public meetings at each stop, I believe you should deal with the specific and topical issues of interest to your hosts while also addressing their more fundamental concerns, thus providing that sense of confidence and reassurance which the Europeans seek. In doing so, you should emphasize our very real assets: the fundamental superiority of our democratic systems; our strong foundation of shared values and interests; the basic vitality and relevance of the Alliance; our reasonable, constructive and forward-looking agenda; and our strength and demonstrated success in working together to achieve shared objectives.

1. U.S. Commitment

You will want to take every occasion to stress that the U.S. commitment to European security is the most fundamental and enduring element of our foreign and defense policy. You should emphasize that it was precisely to strengthen our commitment and link U.S. strategic forces to the security of Europe that we all made the 1979 INF decision and must follow through on it. We are also working hard with Congress to sustain troop levels in Europe. More visible and stronger European efforts are necessary to ensure that we achieve our objectives with Congress.

2. East-West Relations

The continuing Soviet military buildup, and increasing Soviet willingness to use or threaten military force in pursuit of foreign policy objectives threaten international security and stability. As the President has made clear, we can only be successful in responding to this threat through a policy of strength. You should reaffirm the President's consistently stated desire for more positive relations with the Soviet Union and our commitment to work to that end, recalling your own discussions with Andropov. But you should also note that the better relations we are seeking depend on the maintenance of Western will and strength and on deeds, not just words, on the part of the Soviets.

3. Arms Control

Convincing your hosts that we have set reasonable arms control goals and are working effectively to achieve them will be key to the success of your visit. In making this case you will need especially to stress our basic criteria—particularly equality, verifiability, and genuine reductions—and that they are not “demands” but basic principles which we adhere to and which are vital to effective arms control. We are negotiating in good faith and examining each Soviet proposal carefully. You should note that we will continue to draw out the Soviets, while explaining that our proposals offer the best approach for achieving equitable and substantial reductions that will strengthen peace and stability.

4. Consultations

Your trip itself is a demonstration of our commitment to consultations and should be presented in that light. I suggest that you emphasize that one of your principal objectives is to listen and report back to the President, who is keenly interested in the views of the European leadership. You should also point to the importance of NATO's Special Consultative Group (SCG) on INF arms control, the most extensive such mechanism in the history of the Alliance.

U.S.-Soviet Relations in 1983

At Tab A² is a memorandum from George Shultz to the President which sets forth a strategy for "countering new Soviet activism by using an intensified dialogue with Moscow to test whether an improvement in the U.S.-Soviet relationship is possible." Your memorandum to the President (Tab I):

—Conveys serious reservations about the proposed method of implementation and timing.

—Concludes that the U.S. would be forced to dissipate its leverage by making piecemeal concessions in various bilateral negotiations which would not result in any meaningful Soviet response, but would arouse public expectations and make it difficult for us to sustain a firm and resolute course vis-a-vis the USSR.

—Recommends use of existing channels to smoke out real Soviet intentions and their willingness to be flexible on critical issues before embarking on a campaign to improve our bilateral relations.

Dennis Blair, Sven Kraemer, Roger Robinson and Bill Stearman strongly concur with my assessment. All have made significant contributions to the critique of Shultz's memorandum.

SUBJECT

U.S.-Soviet Relations in 1983

George Shultz forwarded you a memorandum (Tab A) outlining how to handle U.S.-Soviet relations in 1983. His memorandum sets forth a strategy for "countering new Soviet activism by using an intensified dialogue with Moscow to test whether an improvement in the U.S.-Soviet relationship is possible." George posits that a "process of dialogue" (Depts. /Desks, Ambassadors, Ministries, Summitry) would help us gauge the seriousness of Andropov's proclaimed intentions to improve U.S.-Soviet relations, and could permit us to seize the high ground domestically and internationally, and foster Allied unity.

Specifically, he argues that the Administration should continue its present arms control policy, resume a dialogue with the Soviets on regional issues (Afghanistan, Africa, Middle East), and continue to seek improved Soviet human rights behavior. On economic and bilateral issues, the Administration should pursue careful and controlled forward steps—no dramatic expansion, only carefully paced positive change. Lastly, he suggests that the whole dialogue process would lead to a summit if relations warrant.

While there may be some initial public relations benefit to explore the possibility of "across the board" improvement in U.S.-Soviet relations, I believe that we should have no illusions about the nature of the Andropov regime. Thus, I have serious reservations about the proposed timing and method of implementation in State's memo. I am specifically concerned that the U.S. would soon be forced to dissipate its leverage by making piecemeal concessions in bilateral negotiations which would not result in any meaningful Soviet response, but which would further intensify rather than mollify domestic and Allied pressures to do more. In sum, this course of action would be sure to arouse even more public expectations and would make it difficult for us to maintain a firm policy vis-a-vis the Soviet Union; moreover, Soviet activism is largely in the field of public propaganda. This is difficult to counter through dialogues which normally remain private.

⁴ Secret; Sensitive. Sent for information. Prepared by Dobriansky.

Instead, I suggest that we use existing channels to smoke out real Soviet intentions and their willingness to be flexible on critical issues before embarking on a campaign to improve our bilateral relations. The private Shultz-Gromyko exchanges, should continue to concentrate on eliciting concrete Soviet views on how military, political and economic aspects of U.S.-Soviet relations can be specifically improved. Right now, I do not see any important areas for give in our basic positions: in arms control, any signal of readiness for compromise on INF would be interpreted by the Soviets as a sign of weakness—a sign that we fear we will be unable to deploy our missiles in Europe; on regional issues, we might be willing to reach some small compromises on individual issues, but we would not make major changes in our positions on Afghanistan, Central America or the Middle East. Since there is no basis for major reciprocal deals, I, therefore, do not see the justification for undertaking a major effort to intensify the dialogue.

If it appears that there is real possibility for progress, then we can respond accordingly. However, if, as is probable, the Soviet positions still offer no room for genuine breakthroughs, it is essential that we be able to maintain firm policy positions and intensify our efforts to portray the USSR as an obstacle to peace. Creating false expectations of progress in U.S.-Soviet relations might buy us some time and temper domestic, and Allied pressure in the short term, but in the long term, public expectations would pressure us for more and more concessions making it exceedingly difficult to sustain a firm and resolute course.

I have grave reservations not only about the overall thrust of the proposed strategy for “improving U.S.-Soviet relations”, but I also disagree with some of the specific policy initiatives set forth.

1. On regional issues, State sees the possibility of new Soviet flexibility on Afghanistan and proposes tabling a bold framework for a comprehensive settlement. There actually seems to be little willingness to compromise in the Soviet position and a proposed settlement by us could lead to negotiations which would take the heat off the Soviets and erode U.S. credibility with Pakistan.

2. Bringing Moscow into renewed bilateral, discussions on Namibia/Angola as State proposes has pitfalls which we should avoid. I suggest that we continue to deal with the problems of Cuban presence in Angola through the frontline African states.

3. State recommends the restoration of government to government economic contacts through the Joint Commercial Commission (JCC). This proposal would send a dramatic signal of changed trade policies and procedures to the business community and would seriously hinder our efforts to forge Allied consensus on East-West economic relations. Any unilateral actions at this time would be counterproductive as the East-West Economic Study is not completed. Instead, trade should continue to be conducted through private channels. Restoration of the JCC can only be seriously contemplated if meaningful improvements in U.S.-Soviet relations appear imminent.

4. In accordance with the terms set forth in NSDD 75 (U.S. Policy Toward the USSR),⁵ a U.S. dialogue with the Soviets should address the full range of U.S. concerns about Soviet internal behavior and human rights violations and not just arms control. However, in addition to what State mentions, arms control—without becoming the centerpiece—should be addressed in these discussions with the expressed purpose of gauging Soviet seriousness of purpose on reductions, equality, verification and compliance. That is, Soviet behavior in INF and their willingness to fundamentally alter their present negotiating stance offers an excellent litmus test of true Soviet intentions vis-a-vis the U.S. If the Soviets are not prepared to relinquish the current clearcut nuclear superiority they enjoy in the European theater, no modicum of dialogue or even of piecemeal agreements in the political/economic sphere would decrease the Soviet threat to Western security.

5. A “process of dialogue” at all levels (Departments/Desks, Ambassadors, Ministries, Summitry) would not be fruitful but counterproductive, as it would serve primarily Soviet interests. We should seek a better balance between contacts through Dobrynin and our Ambassador in Moscow.

6. Finally, a summit meeting is envisioned by State as the ultimate objective of the dialogue proposal. I see little point in summitry until the Soviets have made a major move which clearly demonstrates a willingness to reduce threats to us and the rest of the free world.⁶

138. Memorandum From Dennis Blair of the National Security Council Staff to the President's Assistant for National Security Affairs (Clark)¹

Washington, January 24, 1983

SUBJECT

State of the Union, Shultz and Weinberger concerns

This morning at your 9:30 meeting with the President² you should raise the few suggestions which Secretaries Shultz and Weinberger have with the State of the Union in its current form. They may be getting in touch with you directly.

Shultz: Secretary Shultz believes that the national security section should begin with a section on Western values which underly our national security policy. He also believes that a short section on the relationship between the international economy and our domestic economy should be included. At Tab I is an insert which would do the trick.³

Weinberger: Secretary Weinberger believes the speech should include a section in which the President regrets the military pay cap and says he is determined to make it up when he can. I understand that the President in an earlier draft removed this section. Secretary Weinberger also wishes to insert a section stating that "we must restore our defenses now—not after the economy fully recovers or once an emergency develops," and that defense spending helps, rather than hurts, the economy. Attached at Tab II are two inserts on these subjects.⁴

All of these concerns can be taken care of with relatively simple inserts if you and the President decide to accept them. If the exact language in these inserts is not right, Aram Bakshian can adapt it easily.

139. Address by President Reagan on the State of the Union Before a Joint Session of Congress¹

Washington, January 25, 1983

Address Before a Joint Session of the Congress on the State of the Union

Mr. Speaker, Mr. President,² distinguished Members of the Congress, honored guests, and fellow citizens:

This solemn occasion marks the 196th time that a President of the United States has reported on the State of the Union since George Washington first did so in 1790. That's a lot of reports, but there's no shortage of new things to say about the State of the Union. The very key to our success has been our ability, foremost among nations, to preserve our lasting values by making change work for us rather than against us.

I would like to talk with you this evening about what we can do together—not as Republicans and Democrats, but as Americans—to make tomorrow's America happy and prosperous at home, strong and respected abroad, and at peace in the world.

[Omitted here are remarks unrelated to foreign policy.]

But let us turn briefly to the international arena. America's leadership in the world came to us because of our own strength and because of the values which guide us as a society: free elections, a free press, freedom of religious choice, free trade unions, and above all, freedom for the individual and rejection of the arbitrary power of the state. These values are the bedrock of our strength. They unite us in a stewardship of peace and freedom with our allies and friends in NATO, in Asia, in Latin America, and elsewhere. They are also the values which in the recent past some among us had begun to doubt and view with a cynical eye.

¹Source: Public Papers: Reagan, 1983, Book I, pp. 102–110. All brackets are in the original. The President spoke at 9:03 p.m. in the House Chamber of the Capitol. The address was broadcast live on nationwide radio and television networks. In his personal diary entry for January 25, the President wrote: "St. of the U. went well. Dems. followed it on networks with a film made weeks ago. They goofed—their supposed rebuttal turned out to be an advocacy of things I'd said we were going to do—interrupted here & there with charges that I was against such things. ABC did a before the speech & after-poll. I rose 15 points in approval by the end of the speech." (Brinkley, ed., The Reagan Diaries, vol. I, January 1981–October 1985, p. 192)

²References are to O'Neill and Bush, respectively.

Fortunately, we and our allies have rediscovered the strength of our common democratic values, and we're applying them as a cornerstone of a comprehensive strategy for peace with freedom. In London last year, I announced the commitment of the United States to developing the infrastructure of democracy throughout the world. We intend to pursue this democratic initiative vigorously. The future belongs not to governments and ideologies which oppress their peoples, but to democratic systems of self-government which encourage individual initiative and guarantee personal freedom.

But our strategy for peace with freedom must also be based on strength—economic strength and military strength. A strong American economy is essential to the well-being and security of our friends and allies. The restoration of a strong, healthy American economy has been and remains one of the central pillars of our foreign policy. The progress I've been able to report to you tonight will, I know, be as warmly welcomed by the rest of the world as it is by the American people.

We must also recognize that our own economic well-being is inextricably linked to the world economy. We export over 20 percent of our industrial production, and 40 percent of our farmland produces for export. We will continue to work closely with the industrialized democracies of Europe and Japan and with the International Monetary Fund to ensure it has adequate resources to help bring the world economy back to strong, noninflationary growth.

As the leader of the West and as a country that has become great and rich because of economic freedom, America must be an unrelenting advocate of free trade. As some nations are tempted to turn to protectionism, our strategy cannot be to follow them, but to lead the way toward freer trade. To this end, in May of this year America will host an economic summit meeting in Williamsburg, Virginia.³

As we begin our third year, we have put in place a defense program that redeems the neglect of the past decade. We have developed a realistic military strategy to deter threats to peace and to protect freedom if deterrence fails. Our Armed Forces are finally properly paid; after years of neglect are well trained and becoming better equipped and supplied. And the American uniform is once again worn with pride. Most of the major systems needed for modernizing our defenses are already underway, and we will be addressing one key system, the MX missile, in consultation with the Congress in a few months.

America's foreign policy is once again based on bipartisanship, on realism, strength, full partnership, in consultation with our allies, and constructive negotiation with potential adversaries. From the Middle East to southern Africa to Geneva, American diplomats are taking the initiative to make peace and lower arms levels. We should be proud of our role as peacemakers.

In the Middle East last year, the United States played the major role in ending the tragic fighting in Lebanon and negotiated the withdrawal of the PLO from Beirut.

Last September, I outlined principles to carry on the peace process begun so promisingly at Camp David.⁴ All the people of the Middle East should know that in the year ahead we will not flag in our efforts to build on that foundation to bring them the blessings of peace.

In Central America and the Caribbean Basin, we are likewise engaged in a partnership for peace, prosperity, and democracy. Final passage of the remaining portions of our Caribbean Basin Initiative, which passed the House last year, is one of this administration's top legislative priorities for 1983.⁵

The security and economic assistance policies of this administration in Latin America and elsewhere are based on realism and represent a critical investment in the future of the human race. This undertaking is a joint responsibility of the executive and legislative branches, and I'm counting on the cooperation and statesmanship of the Congress to help us meet this essential foreign policy goal.

At the heart of our strategy for peace is our relationship with the Soviet Union. The past year saw a change in Soviet leadership. We're prepared for a positive change in Soviet-American relations. But the Soviet Union must show by deeds as well as words a sincere commitment to respect the rights and sovereignty of the family of nations. Responsible members of the world community do not threaten or invade their neighbors. And they restrain their allies from aggression.

For our part, we're vigorously pursuing arms reduction negotiations with the Soviet Union. Supported by our allies, we've put forward draft agreements proposing significant weapon reductions to equal and verifiable lower levels. We insist on an equal balance of forces. And given the overwhelming evidence of Soviet violations of international treaties concerning chemical and biological weapons, we also insist that any agreement we sign can and will be verifiable.

⁴See Document 116.

⁵Presumable reference to the trade proposal contained within the broader CBI, which would permit duty free entry on certain goods from Central America and the Caribbean. On December 17, 1982, the House approved the trade bill (H.R. 7397). The Senate Finance Committee approved the bill on December 20 but the full Senate did not take up the bill before it adjourned. (Congress and the Nation, vol. VI, 1981–1984, p. 102)

In the case of intermediate-range nuclear forces, we have proposed the complete elimination of the entire class of land-based missiles. We're also prepared to carefully explore serious Soviet proposals. At the same time, let me emphasize that allied steadfastness remains a key to achieving arms reductions.

With firmness and dedication, we'll continue to negotiate. Deep down, the Soviets must know it's in their interest as well as ours to prevent a wasteful arms race. And once they recognize our unshakable resolve to maintain adequate deterrence, they will have every reason to join us in the search for greater security and major arms reductions. When that moment comes—and I'm confident that it will—we will have taken an important step toward a more peaceful future for all the world's people.

A very wise man, Bernard Baruch, once said that America has never forgotten the nobler things that brought her into being and that light her path. Our country is a special place, because we Americans have always been sustained, through good times and bad, by a noble vision—a vision not only of what the world around us is today but what we as a free people can make it be tomorrow.

We're realists; we solve our problems instead of ignoring them, no matter how loud the chorus of despair around us. But we're also idealists, for it was an ideal that brought our ancestors to these shores from every corner of the world.

Right now we need both realism and idealism. Millions of our neighbors are without work. It is up to us to see they aren't without hope. This is a task for all of us. And may I say, Americans have rallied to this cause, proving once again that we are the most generous people on Earth.

We who are in government must take the lead in restoring the economy. [Applause] And here all that time, I thought you were reading the paper. [Laughter]

The single thing—the single thing that can start the wheels of industry turning again is further reduction of interest rates. Just another 1 or 2 points can mean tens of thousands of jobs.

Right now, with inflation as low as it is, 3.9 percent, there is room for interest rates to come down. Only fear prevents their reduction. A lender, as we know, must charge an interest rate that recovers the depreciated value of the dollars loaned. And that depreciation is, of course, the amount of inflation. Today, interest rates are based on fear—fear that government will resort to measures, as it has in the past, that will send inflation zooming again.

We who serve here in this Capital must erase that fear by making it absolutely clear that we will not stop fighting inflation; that, together, we will do only those things that will lead to lasting economic growth.

Yes, the problems confronting us are large and forbidding. And, certainly, no one can or should minimize the plight of millions of our friends and neighbors who are living in the bleak emptiness of unemployment. But we must and can give them good reason to be hopeful.

Back over the years, citizens like ourselves have gathered within these walls when our nation was threatened; sometimes when its very existence was at stake. Always with courage and common sense, they met the crises of their time and lived to see a stronger, better, and more prosperous country. The present situation is no worse and, in fact, is not as bad as some of those they faced. Time and again, they proved that there is nothing we Americans cannot achieve as free men and women.

Yes, we still have problems—plenty of them. But it's just plain wrong—unjust to our country and unjust to our people—to let those problems stand in the way of the most important truth of all: America is on the mend.

We owe it to the unfortunate to be aware of their plight and to help them in every way we can. No one can quarrel with that. We must and do have compassion for all the victims of this economic crisis. But the big story about America today is the way that millions of confident, caring people—those extraordinary “ordinary” Americans who never make the headlines and will never be interviewed—are laying the foundation, not just for recovery from our present problems but for a better tomorrow for all our people.

From coast to coast, on the job and in classrooms and laboratories, at new construction sites and in churches and community groups, neighbors are helping neighbors. And they've already begun the building, the research, the work, and the giving that will make our country great again.

I believe this, because I believe in them—in the strength of their hearts and minds, in the commitment that each one of them brings to their daily lives, be they high or humble. The challenge for us in government is to be worthy of them—to make government a help, not a hindrance to our people in the challenging but promising days ahead.

If we do that, if we care what our children and our children's children will say of us, if we want them one day to be thankful for what we did here in these temples of freedom, we will work together to make America better for our having been here—not just in this year or this decade but in the next century and beyond.

Thank you, and God bless you.

140. Memorandum From Norman Bailey of the National Security Council Staff to the President's Assistant for National Security Affairs (Clark)¹

Washington, January 27, 1983

SUBJECT

National Security Policy Planning Over the Next Decade

Executive Summary

—Cyclical analysis indicates that 1985/86 will be a period of maximum danger to the economic system and structure of the Western world. However, the current international debt crisis could trigger systemic collapse this year.

—If the traditional patterns of history are repeated, such an economic crisis will lead to social instability, subregional and regional conflict and eventually intercontinental war.

—All this while the Soviet Union has the most intelligent, sophisticated and realistic leadership since Lenin, and the new military technologies are reestablishing the primacy of the offensive.

—History need not mindlessly repeat itself, however. Transition to the next boom based on the fantastic new technologies can be managed but only by an act of will to overcome powerful vested interests. Furthermore, it must be done in this Administration.

—Meanwhile, the center of economic gravity of the world is shifting to the Pacific Basin, and Japan is the only major economic power which has managed its affairs well and thus has the capital base to fuel deployment of the new technologies.

—Thus, our foreign policy and strategies should be directed to the strengthening and consolidation of the Pacific connection while making sure of our security in this Hemisphere and managing the international debt crisis.

Analysis

Introduction

The foreign, security and defense policies of the United States have traditionally suffered from a narrow and short-term point of view, responding in an ad hoc and improvised fashion to the concerns and crises of the moment. This was never a good thing, but we could get away with it while the country was relatively isolated from the rest of the world, and later when our power and wealth were overwhelming. Since the disaster of the Vietnam war (which, let us remember, MacArthur and Eisenhower warned against, Kennedy and Johnson got us into and Nixon got us out of), this is no longer true. As a result, the ad hoc approach is now not only inadvisable but extremely dangerous. We are already in a period of maximum peril which will last for many years. Consequently, the direction the country is moving in must be set, to the extent possible, in the remaining years of this Administration. Since no one knows whether that will be two or six years, and since 1984 will be an election year subject to even more severe political pressures than in 1982, the conclusion must be that 1983 is crucial.

The Primacy of Economic Factors, 1983-c. 1988/90

The short, medium and long economic cycles all tended downwards in the period 1979–1982 leading to a liquidity crisis on top of the solvency crisis caused by years of profligacy and inflation. The short cycle is now tending upwards and will be until 1985/86. Ordinarily, the short cycle is dominant over the longer cycles and thus a recovery could be expected until approximately 1985 when all three cycles will again coincide downward. The recovery will be very weak, however, due to a serious capital shortage and the very low base of solvency and liquidity from which the recovery will start. In other words, even a high percentage figure (say 6% annual real growth in GNP in 1983, which no one expects) would not really mean that much, since corporations will be rebuilding their shattered capital bases, rather than investing in new plants, equipment and technology.

Thus, the next simultaneous cyclical downturn will take place before there has been any substantial recovery and will probably lead to a systemic collapse. This, incidentally, would be perfectly normal. During a long cyclical up-cycle, capital gradually becomes frozen in obsolescent industries and the fruits of the technological innovations that triggered the economic boom are frittered away in excessive consumption and speculation rather than devoted to savings and capital formation. The crash that follows wipes out the old capital structure and the new technologies trigger a new up-cycle. Kondratieff told us how this happens and Schumpeter explained why.² The fact that it has happened over and over again in world economic history approximately every two generations does not mean that it is inevitable, however. It is caused by the inflexibility of vested interests in frozen capital and thus can, at least in theory, be broken by an act of will.

The incredible technologies now under development—genetic engineering, bio-chips, micro-chips, robotization, fifth generation computers, cloning, fusion power and many others will totally transform the world and lead to the greatest economic boom in history (unless the world destroys itself first). Barring universal destruction, the question really is not whether it will happen but how, when and under whose auspices.

If history repeats itself mindlessly, the economic collapse of 1985/86 will in turn lead to a wave of social unrest, violence and civil conflict in the 1985–1990 timeframe. Again, this would be a repeat of the “normal” historical experience. It should be pointed out here that the time sequences mentioned in this memo might be telescoped as a result of the international debt situation proving unmanageable in the short-term, which would result in a systemic collapse this year, followed by the social and political consequences mentioned. Should that happen, the strategy outlined here will have been overtaken by events and ad hockery will reign supreme. This is a real possibility, but my best estimate is still that the point of maximum danger will occur about 1985/86.

Subregional and regional armed conflicts will increase as governments in desperation try to turn their subjects’ attention away from domestic problems. In the 1988–1993 period, these conflicts may well spread and eventually turn into generalized intercontinental warfare, at precisely the time when the science fiction advances in military technology are again, as in World War II, establishing the primacy of the offensive in warfare.

The Andropov Factor

All of this is taking place at a time when the Soviet Union, which has always operated in strategic terms in contrast to our tactical, reactive tendencies, has the most intelligent and subtle leadership since Lenin. In the very short time since he has taken power, Andropov has already demonstrated a sophisticated understanding of the mentality of the Western world and a lively realization of the limitations of Soviet resources as well as the necessity for economic liberalization while maintaining a political iron grip. Out of economic constraint concessions will be made on peripheral issues and in peripheral places and then trumpeted to the world as major gestures demanding a Western response. Detente will blossom again (it already has), lightening Soviet burdens and constraints and enabling continued concentration on the modernization of the Soviet capability to wage limited and general war and to take advantage of widespread social entropy in the West and the developing world.

Geostrategic Shifts

In the last five thousand years, there have been only three major shifts in the geostrategic epicenter of the world. The most recent occurred in the 18th and early 19th centuries when the Mediterranean rim finally lost the position it had occupied since 200 B.C., and the focus of economic, military and political power became centered in the northern Hemisphere between the Urals and the Mississippi. The center of political and military power is still there, but the center of worldwide economic gravity is shifting to the Pacific Basin with great rapidity. This is taking place in an area that for accidental historical reasons is something of a military vacuum, which may give us a hint of where the intercontinental conflict mentioned earlier is likely to be centered. This vacuum will eventually be filled, and there are only four candidates—China, which for various reasons is unlikely to do so by the end of the century; the Soviet Union, which will try to do so but which has serious logistical problems; Japan or the U.S. Clearly it is in our interests to see to it that the vacuum is filled by the U.S. and Japan jointly in close cooperation. The flow of history can be quixotically opposed with predictable negative results or it can be used and worked with. Obsolete policy and strategic baggage must be gradually lightened and eventually replaced, if we are not to be in the position of being prepared for yesterday's challenges but faced with today's.

Implications

If the above analysis is correct, various conclusions must be drawn from it.

—Rebuilding the capital base of the economy of the Western world and simultaneously shifting resources to the new technologies in an organized fashion, and not through the chaos of a systemic collapse, is essential to prevent or minimize the social and political consequences of the period of transition.

—It is clear that while this Administration's economic policies were directed towards achieving exactly that result, the political will does not exist in the American people and Congress to carry the process through thoroughly and rapidly.

—The necessary political will exists to an even lesser extent in Europe.

—The defense buildup, and especially development and deployment of the new technologies, must be maintained. Nevertheless, it is highly likely that the Andropov strategy will succeed in seriously weakening this resolve, again more in Europe than here, but also here. Therefore, the necessity to maintain and widen the technological lead in defense, as opposed to sheer mass.

—The necessary capital as well as a remarkable ability and willingness to apply this capital to new technologies and not leave it frozen in obsolescent industries is found only in Japan, which is simultaneously the economic engine of the Pacific Basin phenomenon and which will rearm by the end of the century as the generation of World War II dies off, with us or without us.

—As a result, the Pacific Basin and, particularly, Japan must be the centerpiece of our foreign policy for the rest of the century. This again will require an act of political will to overcome frozen intellectual and political capital now centered in Europe and the Middle East. Doing so will provide a powerful pole of attraction for China and India and freeze the Soviet Union, out of the new geostrategic world complex.

—Momentum in this direction must be firmly in place by the end of this Administration or it will not happen.

—In the meantime, the current international financial crisis must be overcome or all of the above will be overtaken by events.

—We must also maintain control over our own Hemisphere. Latin American policy and strategy must be formulated and firmly carried out in an area where this Administration is weak and where public, media and academic support is even weaker than in the area of defense policy.

Conclusions

I propose, therefore, as Director of Planning, with responsibility for political and economic matters, to concentrate my energies and attention during 1983 to:

—Promoting and consolidating the Japanese relationship in particular and the Pacific Basin relationship in general.

—Doing what I can to help manage the international debt crisis so that a systemic collapse does not occur this year.

—Supporting the effort to resist the deterioration of our position in the Hemisphere.

The second and third items are obviously interrelated and are necessary to provide the conditions for success of the first.

All of this will be attempted in the face of powerful vested interests both inside and outside of the government, as well as incompetence, confusion, ignorance and in some areas very thin staffing. The resources and big guns are on the other side. If you agree, however, the attempt will be made.

President Reagan. I know that you all have concerns about the Middle East situation and we do too. Ambassador Habib is trying to bring about a solution in Lebanon. This will help us proceed with the peace process. My view is that the greatest security for Israel lies in peace with its Arab neighbors. It cannot go on as an armed camp experiencing 130% inflation. Maybe there has been a misunderstanding, but the only way to proceed is to convince the Arabs to negotiate peace. On Lebanon, the new government there is having difficulties. They are asking all foreign forces to leave. By staying, Israel puts itself in a position of occupation. I know that some Lebanese want to help Israel for getting rid of the PLO. I hope the Israeli government can be persuaded to leave. I will not let anything happen that would endanger Israeli security. We are making headway with King Hussein. We must make progress, but Jordan is not Egypt and cannot afford to be isolated or to become a pariah.

XIX, Arab-Israeli Dispute.

Julius Berman. The Jewish community is very grateful for the way the Administration acted during the summer. Attacks against Israel were unfair. American and Israeli goals have been the same historically. We all look forward to the ultimate peace process. Israel has stated time and again its readiness to negotiate. Yet the Arabs won't stop talking about talking to Israel. Yet, the perception here in the White House is that Israel is intransigent. But the bottom line is Israel is ready to talk and no one is on the other side.

President Reagan. Regarding Lebanon, we must let Lebanon establish its sovereignty. All foreign forces must get out. It was our own idea to put in the multi-national force to help stabilize Lebanon. Our efforts with Hussein and the Arabs are affected by their feeling that they cannot come to the peace table while Israel is in Lebanon.

Julius Berman. Have they said if the Israelis clear out of Lebanon that they will come to the table?

President Reagan. Hussein said he is ready but the only precondition is withdrawal from Lebanon.

Julius Berman. The only precondition? Did I just learn that Hussein told you he would join the peace process when Israel leaves Lebanon?

William P. Clark. It is not that explicit. A great deal has been said in private between the President and the King. We do not reveal the details of discussions between Heads of State. It would be unfair to go beyond what has already been said publicly.

Robert C. McFarlane. The spirit of King Hussein's message is that he is close to receiving an endorsement to represent the others. A Lebanon solution is necessary but not a precondition.

William P. Clark. We have said this before. It is not something new. The King said it publicly.

President Reagan. When the King was here we had a private talk then a regular discussion with his advisors.² It is sometimes hard to put it exactly as he said it. But he is heart and soul supportive. He is trying to satisfy the point of view of the Palestinians, but needs a go-ahead from his allies. Mubarak also told me he wants to go forward to improve Egypt-Israeli relations but is held back by Lebanon.³ A halt to settlement activity during negotiations will also be necessary.

²The President met with King Hussein at the White House on December 21, 1982. (Reagan Library, President's Daily Diary) Documentation on the visit is scheduled for publication in Foreign Relations, 1981-1988, vol. XIX, Arab-Israeli Dispute.

³The President met with Mubarak in the Oval Office on January 27, from 11:30 until 11:55 a.m. From 11:55 a.m. until 12:25 p.m. the President and Mubarak met in the Cabinet Room and were joined by U.S. and Egyptian officials. (Reagan Library, President's Daily Diary) Documentation on the visit is scheduled for publication in Foreign Relations, 1981-1988, vol. XIX, Arab-Israeli Dispute.

Edgar Bronfman. Are the Syrians and PLO willing to pull out?

President Reagan. Yes, and Lebanon has asked them to leave.

William P. Clark. We are working on a continuum since the cessation of combat. It is in the mutual interests of all to withdraw. There has been no change in our policy. However as each day passes without progress the Soviets show greater interest. There are more incidents, such as the wounding of French troops.

President Reagan. The analogy is not exact but I can't help but compare this situation to what we experienced on the campuses in the 1960s. The Communist Party line became not to directly cause a conflict, but wherever there was a chance for a conflict, to get involved. It is the same with the Soviets today. They are always looking to exploit and worsen existing problems.

Albert Spiegel. I want to reaffirm the Jewish community's commitment to the give and take of negotiations. This expectation gives us comfort. Your own personal involvement and commitment, especially what you said on September 1, is fully appreciated. But it is important that we get Israel to the negotiating table without having to give up anything in advance of negotiations.

President Reagan. You are right. We are aware of the feeling that we may have given something away to the Arabs that must be negotiated. When Israel went into Lebanon the Arabs believed we were involved. They are so convinced of the closeness of U.S.-Israeli relations that they cannot believe that if we want Israel to leave Lebanon, Israel won't leave. This perception affects our ability to convince them to join the peace process.

The meeting adjourned at 9:55 a.m.

142. Editorial Note

On February 24, 1983, Secretary of State George Shultz delivered an address before the Southern Center for International Studies in Atlanta. Noting that the speech afforded him the "opportunity for me to use a wide-angle lens," Shultz explained that while the "broad picture is ever in our mind," the daily business of the Department of State "generally finds us using not the broad brush but the jeweler's glass as we examine the myriad individual issues on which our foreign relations turn. So today I want to begin by opening the lens full scope. I will describe the fundamental tenets which underlie President Reagan's foreign policy.

"Then I'd like to turn the lens down in two successive notches: first, a moderate turn to discuss the importance to our foreign policy of the more than 100 developing countries of the Third World—Asia, Africa, and South America.

"Finally, I plan to focus way down and—in this time of tight budgets—discuss the funds which the United States must expend to achieve its objectives. Contrary to public opinion, the currency of foreign affairs is not cookies. It takes resources—modest but sustained, applied credibly over time—to secure international peace, foster economic growth, and help insure the well-being of each of our citizens. But we'll start with the broader view.

"Since his inauguration 2 years ago, President Reagan has sought to revitalize U.S. foreign policy. He is resolved to reduce a decade's accumulation of doubt about the U.S. commitment and staying power. Our watchwords in doing this are four ideas:

"First, we start with realism.

"Second, we build with strength.

"Third, we stress the indispensable need to negotiate and to reach agreements.

"Fourth, we keep the faith. We believe that progress is possible even though the tasks are complex.

"Let me take each of these very briefly in turn. I'm very conscious of them, because as I get caught up in the day-to-day details of foreign policy and go over to the White House to discuss my current problems with the President, he has the habit of bringing me back to these fundamentals. And I believe they are truly fundamental.

"Realism. If we're going to improve our world, we have to understand it. And it's got a lot of good things about it; it's got a lot of bad things about it. We have to be willing to describe them to ourselves. We have to be willing if we see aggression to call it aggression. We have to be willing if we see the use of chemical and biological warfare contrary to agreements to get up and say so and document the point. When we see persecution, we have to be willing to get up and say that's the reality, whether it happens to be in a country that is friendly to us or not.

"When we look at economic problems around the world, we have to be able to describe them to ourselves candidly and recognize that there are problems. That's where you have to start, if you're going to do something about them. So, I think realism is an essential ingredient in the conduct of our foreign policy.

"Strength. Next, I believe is strength. We must have military strength, if we're going to stand up to the problems that we confront around the world and the problems imposed on us by the military strength of the Soviet Union and the demonstrated willingness of the Soviet Union to use its strength without any compunction whatever.

“So, military strength is essential, but I think we delude ourselves if we don’t recognize—as we do, as the President does—that military strength rests on a strong economy; on an economy that has the capacity to invest in its future, believe in its future—as you do here in Atlanta; an economy that brings inflation under control and that stimulates the productivity that goes with adequate savings and investment and has given us the rising standard of living and remarkable economic development that our country has known. But more than that, we have to go back to our own beliefs and ideals and be sure that we believe in them. And there is no way to do that better than to live by them ourselves. So, we have to maintain our own self-confidence and our own will power and our own notion that we are on the right track to go with the strength in our economy and our military capability.

“Negotiation. Of course, beyond this, if we are realistic and we are strong, I believe it is essential that we also are ready to go out and solve problems, to negotiate with people, to try to resolve the difficulties that we see all around the world—not simply because in doing so we help the places where those difficulties are but because in doing so we also help ourselves, we further our own interests. So, negotiation and working out problems has got to be a watchword for us, and we do that all around the world. I think it is no exaggeration to say that the efforts of the United States resulted in saving the city of Beirut from complete destruction. We are active in trying to resolve difficulties in Kampuchea. We have called attention to the problems in Afghanistan. We’re working in Southern Africa in a most difficult situation to bring about a resolution of the Namibia issues, and so on around the world. But I like to think that the United States must be conceived of as part of the solution and not part of the problem. That’s where we want to be standing.

“Finally, if we can achieve these things, if we can be strong enough so that people must take us seriously, and put our ideas forward in a realistic manner, then we will be able to solve problems and have some competence to be successful, and, if we’re successful, certainly the world can be better.”

Shultz then discussed relations with the Third World and foreign aid before concluding his remarks: “Let me close by opening my lens back up and reverting to the fourth of the tenets which guide our conduct of foreign affairs: namely, our conviction that progress is possible. We Americans have lived for over 40 years in a tumultuous world in which we have pursued four basic goals:

“First, building world peace and deterring war—above all, nuclear war which would threaten human existence;

“Second, containing the influence of nations which are fundamentally opposed to our values and interests—notably the Soviet Union and its allies;

“Third, fostering a growing world economy and protecting U.S. access to free markets and critical resources; and “Fourth, encouraging other nations to adopt principles of self-determination, economic freedom, and the rule of law which are the foundation stones of American society.

“In these endeavors, we have had some signal successes. Some formerly troubled countries of the world—for instance, the countries of East Asia—are now relatively strong and prosperous. Western Europe, a cockpit of warring nationalities for a century, has been at peace for 37 years. Progress has been made in fundamental areas affecting the mass of mankind: better health, longer life expectancy, more schooling, increased income. We have a chance in the coming year to make major strides in fashioning peace in the Middle East.

“Americans as a people are pragmatists, suspicious of grand assurances or easy promises. But I’m convinced that if we persevere—proceeding realistically, backed by strength, fully willing to negotiate and search for agreement—we will be able to brighten the future for ourselves and for others throughout the world.” (Department of State Bulletin, April 1983, pages 25–28)

143. Editorial Note

On March 8, 1983, President Ronald Reagan delivered remarks at the national convention of the National Association of Evangelicals in Orlando, Florida. Earlier that day, the President visited Epcot Center at Walt Disney World, where he viewed a film, attended a reception with students participating in the World Showcase Fellowship Program, and offered remarks to outstanding Florida math and science students. (Reagan Library, President’s Daily Diary) After departing Disney World, the President traveled to the Sheraton Twin Towers Hotel, where he spoke to the evangelicals at 3:04 p.m. in the Citrus Crown Ballroom. After discussing the state of religion in the United States and denouncing racism, anti-Semitism, and other forms of ethnic and racial hatred, the President addressed U.S.-Soviet relations and the ill-advisability of a nuclear weapons freeze: “But whatever sad episodes exist in our past, any objective observer must hold a positive view of American history, a history that has been the story of hopes fulfilled and dreams made into reality. Especially in this century, America has kept alight the torch of freedom, but not just for ourselves but for millions of others around the world.

“And this brings me to my final point today. During my first press conference as President, in answer to a direct question, I pointed out that, as good Marxist-Leninists, the Soviet leaders have openly and publicly declared that the only morality they recognize is that which will further their cause, which is world revolution. I think I should point out I was only quoting Lenin, their guiding spirit, who said in 1920 that they repudiate all morality that proceeds from supernatural ideas—that’s their name for religion—or ideas that are outside class conceptions. Morality is entirely subordinate to the interests of class war. And everything is moral that is necessary for the annihilation of the old, exploiting social order and for uniting the proletariat.

“Well, I think the refusal of many influential people to accept this elementary fact of Soviet doctrine illustrates an historical reluctance to see totalitarian powers for what they are. We saw this phenomenon in the 1930’s. We see it too often today.

“This doesn’t mean we should isolate ourselves and refuse to seek an understanding with them. I intend to do everything I can to persuade them of our peaceful intent, to remind them that it was the West that refused to use its nuclear monopoly in the forties and fifties for territorial gain and which now proposes 50-percent cut in strategic ballistic missiles and the elimination of an entire class of land-based, intermediate-range nuclear missiles.

“At the same time, however, they must be made to understand we will never compromise our principles and standards. We will never give away our freedom. We will never abandon our belief in God. And we will never stop searching for a genuine peace. But we can assure none of these things America stands for through the so-called nuclear freeze solutions proposed by some.

“The truth is that a freeze now would be a very dangerous fraud, for that is merely the illusion of peace. The reality is that we must find peace through strength.

“I would agree to a freeze if only we could freeze the Soviets’ global desires. A freeze at current levels of weapons would remove any incentive for the Soviets to negotiate seriously in Geneva and virtually end our chances to achieve the major arms reductions which we have proposed. Instead, they would achieve their objectives through the freeze.

“A freeze would reward the Soviet Union for its enormous and unparalleled military buildup. It would prevent the essential and long overdue modernization of United States and allied defenses and would leave our aging forces increasingly vulnerable. And an honest freeze would require extensive prior negotiations on the systems and numbers to be limited and on the measures to ensure effective verification and compliance. And the kind of a freeze that has been suggested would be virtually impossible to verify. Such a major effort would divert us completely from our current negotiations on achieving substantial reductions.

“A number of years ago, I heard a young father, a very prominent young man in the entertainment world, addressing a tremendous gathering in California. It was during the time of the cold war, and communism and our own way of life were very much on people’s minds. And he was speaking to that subject. And suddenly, though, I heard him saying, ‘I love my little girls more than anything—’ And I said to myself, ‘Oh, no, don’t. You can’t—don’t say that.’ But I had underestimated him. He went on: ‘I would rather see my little girls die now, still believing in God, than have them grow up under communism, and one day die no longer believing in God.’

“There were thousands of young people in that audience. They came to their feet with shouts of joy. They had instantly recognized the profound truth in what he had said, with regard to the physical and the soul and what was truly important.

“Yes, let us pray for the salvation of all of those who live in that totalitarian darkness—pray they will discover the joy of knowing God. But until they do, let us be aware that while they preach the supremacy of the state, declare its omnipotence over individual man, and predict its eventual domination of all peoples on the Earth, they are the focus of evil in the modern world.

“It was C.S. Lewis who, in his unforgettable ‘Screwtape Letters,’ wrote: ‘The greatest evil is not done now in those sordid “dens of crime” that Dickens loved to paint. It is not even done in concentration camps and labor camps. In those we see its final result. But it is conceived and ordered (moved, seconded, carried and minuted) in clear, carpeted, warmed, and well-lighted offices, by quiet men with white collars and cut fingernails and smooth-shaven cheeks who do not need to raise their voice.’

“Well, because these ‘quiet men’ do not ‘raise their voices,’ because they sometimes speak in soothing tones of brotherhood and peace, because, like other dictators before them, they’re always making ‘their final territorial demand,’ some would have us accept them at their word and accommodate ourselves to their aggressive impulses. But if history teaches anything, it teaches that simple-minded appeasement or wishful thinking about our adversaries is folly. It means the betrayal of our past, the squandering of our freedom.

“So, I urge you to speak out against those who would place the United States in a position of military and moral inferiority. You know, I’ve always believed that old Screwtape reserved his best efforts for those of you in the church. So, in your discussions of the nuclear freeze proposals, I urge you to beware the temptation of pride—the temptation of blithely declaring yourselves above it all and label both sides equally at fault, to ignore the facts of history and the aggressive impulses of an evil empire, to simply call the arms race a giant misunderstanding and thereby remove yourself from the struggle between right and wrong and good and evil.

“I ask you to resist the attempts of those who would have you withhold your support for our efforts, this administration’s efforts, to keep America strong and free, while we negotiate real and verifiable reductions in the world’s nuclear arsenals and one day, with God’s help, their total elimination.

“While America’s military strength is important, let me add here that I’ve always maintained that the struggle now going on for the world will never be decided by bombs or rockets, by armies or military might. The real crisis we face today is a spiritual one; at root, it is a test of moral will and faith.

“Whittaker Chambers, the man whose own religious conversion made him a witness to one of the terrible traumas of our time, the Hiss-Chambers case, wrote that the crisis of the Western World exists to the degree in which the West is indifferent to God, the degree to which it collaborates in communism’s attempt to make man stand alone without God. And then he said, for Marxism-Leninism is actually the second oldest faith, first proclaimed in the Garden of Eden with the words of temptation, ‘Ye shall be as gods.’

“The Western World can answer this challenge, he wrote, ‘but only provided that its faith in God and the freedom He enjoins is as great as communism’s faith in Man.’

“I believe we shall rise to the challenge. I believe that communism is another sad, bizarre chapter in human history whose last pages even now are being written. I believe this because the source of our strength in the quest for human freedom is not material, but spiritual. And because it knows no limitation, it must terrify and ultimately triumph over those who would enslave their fellow man. For in the words of Isaiah: ‘He giveth power to the faint; and to them that have no might He increased strength. . . . But they that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength; they shall mount up with wings as eagles; they shall run, and not be weary. . . .’

“Yes, change your world. One of our Founding Fathers, Thomas Paine, said, ‘We have it within our power to begin the world over again.’ We can do it, doing together what no one church could do by itself.

“God bless you, and thank you very much.” (Public Papers: Reagan, 1983, Book I, pages 362–364)

The complete text of Reagan's address is ibid., pages 359–364. In his personal diary entry for March 8, the President wrote: "Off to a warm, sunshiny Fla. First meetings were at Disneys Epcot—their world history center. It was a fascinating place. My talk was to hundreds of bright, young highschool students including foreign exchange students. Then to the convention of Evangelical clergy. My speech was well received—3 standing ovations during the speech. I talked of parents rights (squeal rule) abortion, school prayer and our need for a strong defense." (Brinkley, ed., The Reagan Diaries, volume I, January 1981–October 1985, page 203) In recalling the address, Secretary of State George Shultz wrote: "The 'evil empire' phrase would take on a life of its own. Calling the Soviet Union an 'evil empire' transformed this into a major speech, even though it had not been planned or developed through any careful or systematic process. No doubt Soviet leaders were offended, and many of our friends were alarmed. How conscious of the implications of their words the president and his speechwriters were, I do not know. Whether or not he was wise to use this phrase to describe the Soviet Union, it was in fact an empire and evil abounded." (Shultz, Turmoil and Triumph, page 267) recognizing the need for close consultations with our allies, the development of a long comprehensive and intensive effort to define a long-term research and development program in defensive systems which, if successful, might ultimately eliminate the threat posed by ballistic missiles. This initiative could lead to increasing reliance upon the contribution of defensive systems rather than on such missiles.

2. In doing so the President fully recognizes that as we pursue our defensive technologies, we must remember that our allies rely upon US strategic offensive power to deter attacks against them. Their vital interests and ours remain inextricably linked. We will continue fully to honor our commitments.

3. The technological challenge is certainly great, but if met successfully, the goal would be ultimately to end the era of reliance on ballistic missiles. In fact, the reduction in the direct threat posed to our societies and populations by ballistic missiles would make even more credible the deterrence provided by our other forces.

4. In his speech, the President also intends to increase the American people's understanding of the reasons for our defense modernization program and the need to sustain a substantial defense effort, despite the economic costs it entails. He plans to draw attention to the sustained Soviet military buildup, the impressive advancement in the quality as well as the quantity of Soviet weapons systems, and the increased Soviet willingness to translate Soviet power into political intimidation.

5. His main thrust in doing so is to explain why freedom, security and peace depend on our program of rearmament. His objective is to rise above a sterile debate about this or that level of defense spending and concentrate on the threats we face and the steps needed to counter them.

6. The President's speech will be nationally televised at 8:00 PM Eastern standard time, March 23, (1:00 AM Greenwich mean time, March 24). Action addressees, at the first opportunity thereafter, should transmit the substance of the previous paragraphs to host governments, drawing on the following talking points and, as appropriate, on the questions and answers provided in para 10 below. Info addressees except for military addressees as appropriate may also convey the substance of these points to host governments.

7. For military addressees: the content of this message is provided for your information only. It should not RPT not be used by command information officers to respond to media queries. Queries regarding President's speech should be referred to the White House until otherwise instructed. Public affairs guidance will be promulgated by OSAD-PA by separate message.⁴

8. Begin talking points:

— The President indicated that he is prepared, with appropriate consultation, to direct a comprehensive and intensive effort to define a long-term research and development program to develop a technology for defense against the threat posed by ballistic missiles. These steps may permit a future—after the turn of the century—policy which relies on defense ballistic missile attack rather than exclusively on retaliation.

— The President's initiative has the full support of the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Defense, the President's senior advisors, and the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

— The initiative would in no way lead to shifts in priorities away from necessary strategic and intermediate range nuclear force modernization. These forces are clearly needed to offset the massive buildup in Soviet offensive capabilities and to hold the line until a more defense-oriented posture becomes possible.

— The goal in the INF and START talks remains what it has been: the elimination of an entire class of nuclear missiles—in the former; significant reductions in nuclear armaments in the latter. This initiative complements our other efforts to reduce or eliminate the threat posed by nuclear offensive weapons.

— We want to emphasize that it in no way signals any change in US policy regarding the ABM treaty.

— The US will work closely with the Allies to ensure that their security is enhanced by the developments we undertake and to maintain an effective common deterrent against the entire spectrum of possible aggression. End talking points.

145. Address by President Reagan to the Nation¹

Washington, March 23, 1983

Address to the Nation on Defense and National Security

My fellow Americans, thank you for sharing your time with me tonight.

The subject I want to discuss with you, peace and national security, is both timely and important. Timely, because I've reached a decision which offers a new hope for our children in the 21st century, a decision I'll tell you about in a few minutes. And important because there's a very big decision that you must make for yourselves. This subject involves the most basic duty that any President and any people share, the duty to protect and strengthen the peace.

At the beginning of this year, I submitted to the Congress a defense budget which reflects my best judgment of the best understanding of the experts and specialists who advise me about what we and our allies must do to protect our people in the years ahead. That budget is much more than a long list of numbers, for behind all the numbers lies America's ability to prevent the greatest of human tragedies and preserve our free way of life in a sometimes dangerous world. It is part of a careful, long-term plan to make America strong again after too many years of neglect and mistakes.

Our efforts to rebuild America's defenses and strengthen the peace began 2 years ago when we requested a major increase in the defense program. Since then, the amount of those increases we first proposed has been reduced by half, through improvements in management and procurement and other savings.

The budget request that is now before the Congress has been trimmed to the limits of safety. Further deep cuts cannot be made without seriously endangering the security of the Nation. The choice is up to the men and women you've elected to the Congress, and that means the choice is up to you.

Tonight, I want to explain to you what this defense debate is all about and why I'm convinced that the budget now before the Congress is necessary, responsible, and deserving of your support. And I want to offer hope for the future.

But first, let me say what the defense debate is not about. It is not about spending arithmetic. I know that in the last few weeks you've been bombarded with numbers and percentages. Some say we need only a 5-percent increase in defense spending. The so-called alternate budget backed by liberals in the House of Representatives would lower the figure to 2 to 3 percent, cutting our defense spending by $163 billion over the next 5 years. The trouble with all these numbers is that they tell us little about the kind of defense program America needs or the benefits and security and freedom that our defense effort buys for us.

What seems to have been lost in all this debate is the simple truth of how a defense budget is arrived at. It isn't done by deciding to spend a certain number of dollars. Those loud voices that are occasionally heard charging that the Government is trying to solve a security problem by throwing money at it are nothing more than noise based on ignorance. We start by considering what must be done to maintain peace and review all the possible threats against our security. Then a strategy for strengthening peace and defending against those threats must be agreed upon. And, finally, our defense establishment must be evaluated to see what is necessary to protect against any or all of the potential threats. The cost of achieving these ends is totaled up, and the result is the budget for national defense.

There is no logical way that you can say, let's spend x billion dollars less. You can only say, which part of our defense measures do we believe we can do without and still have security against all contingencies? Anyone in the Congress who advocates a percentage or a specific dollar cut in defense spending should be made to say what part of our defenses he would eliminate, and he should be candid enough to acknowledge that his cuts mean cutting our commitments to allies or inviting greater risk or both.

The defense policy of the United States is based on a simple premise: The United States does not start fights. We will never be an aggressor. We maintain our strength in order to deter and defend against aggression—to preserve freedom and peace.

Since the dawn of the atomic age, we've sought to reduce the risk of war by maintaining a strong deterrent and by seeking genuine arms control. "Deterrence" means simply this: making sure any adversary who thinks about attacking the United States, or our allies, or our vital interests, concludes that the risks to him outweigh any potential gains. Once he understands that, he won't attack. We maintain the peace through our strength; weakness only invites aggression.

This strategy of deterrence has not changed. It still works. But what it takes to maintain deterrence has changed. It took one kind of military force to deter an attack when we had far more nuclear weapons than any other power; it takes another kind now that the Soviets, for example have enough accurate and powerful nuclear weapons to destroy virtually all of our missiles on the ground. Now, this is not to say that the Soviet Union is planning to make war on us. Nor do I believe a war is inevitable—quite the contrary. But what must be recognized is that our security is based on being prepared to meet all threats.

There was a time when we depended on coastal forts and artillery batteries, because, with the weaponry of that day, any attack would have had to come by sea. Well, this is a different world, and our defenses must be based on recognition and awareness of the weaponry possessed by other nations in the nuclear age.

We can't afford to believe that we will never be threatened. There have been two world wars in my lifetime. We didn't start them and, indeed, did everything we could to avoid being drawn into them. But we were ill-prepared for both. Had we been better prepared, peace might have been preserved.

For 20 years the Soviet Union has been accumulating enormous military might. They didn't stop when their forces exceeded all requirements of a legitimate defensive capability. And they haven't stopped now. During the past decade and a half, the Soviets have built up a massive arsenal of new strategic nuclear weapons—weapons that can strike directly at the United States.

As an example, the United States introduced its last new intercontinental ballistic missile, the Minute Man III, in 1969, and we're now dismantling our even older Titan missiles. But what has the Soviet Union done in these intervening years? Well, since 1969 the Soviet Union has built five new classes of ICBM's, and upgraded these eight times. As a result, their missiles are much more powerful and accurate than they were several years ago, and they continue to develop more, while ours are increasingly obsolete.

The same thing has happened in other areas. Over the same period, the Soviet Union built 4 new classes of submarine-launched ballistic missiles and over 60 new missile submarines. We built 2 new types of submarine missiles and actually withdrew 10 submarines from strategic missions. The Soviet Union built over 200 new Backfire bombers, and their brand new Blackjack bomber is now under development. We haven't built a new long-range bomber since our B-52's were deployed about a quarter of a century ago, and we've already retired several hundred of those because of old age. Indeed, despite what many people think, our strategic forces only cost about 15 percent of the defense budget.

Another example of what's happened: In 1978 the Soviets had 600 intermediate-range nuclear missiles based on land and were beginning to add the SS-20—a new, highly accurate, mobile missile with 3 warheads. We had none. Since then the Soviets have strengthened their lead. By the end of 1979, when Soviet leader Brezhnev declared “a balance now exists,” the Soviets had over 800 warheads. We still had none. A year ago this month, Mr. Brezhnev pledged a moratorium, or freeze, on SS-20 deployment. But by last August, their 800 warheads had become more than 1,200. We still had none. Some freeze. At this time Soviet Defense Minister Ustinov announced “approximate parity of forces continues to exist.” But the Soviets are still adding an average of 3 new warheads a week, and now have 1,300. These warheads can reach their targets in a matter of a few minutes. We still have none. So far, it seems that the Soviet definition of parity is a box score of 1,300 to nothing, in their favor.

So, together with our NATO allies, we decided in 1979 to deploy new weapons,² beginning this year, as a deterrent to their SS-20's and as an incentive to the Soviet Union to meet us in serious arms control negotiations. We will begin that deployment late this year. At the same time, however, we're willing to cancel our program if the Soviets will dismantle theirs. This is what we've called a zero-zero plan. The Soviets are now at the negotiating table—and I think it's fair to say that without our planned deployments, they wouldn't be there.

Now, let's consider conventional forces. Since 1974 the United States produced 3,050 tactical combat aircraft. By contrast, the Soviet Union has produced twice as many. When we look at attack submarines, the United States has produced 27 while the Soviet Union has produced 61. For armored vehicles, including tanks, we have produced 11,200. The Soviet Union has produced 54,000—nearly 5 to 1 in their favor. Finally, with artillery, we've produced 950 artillery and rocket launchers while the Soviets have produced more than 13,000—a staggering 14-to-1 ratio.

² See footnote 6, Document 35.

There was a time when we were able to offset superior Soviet numbers with higher quality, but today they are building weapons as sophisticated and modern as our own.

As the Soviets have increased their military power, they've been emboldened to extend that power. They're spreading their military influence in ways that can directly challenge our vital interests and those of our allies.

The following aerial photographs, most of them secret until now, illustrate this point in a crucial area very close to home: Central America and the Caribbean Basin. They're not dramatic photographs. But I think they help give you a better understanding of what I'm talking about.

This Soviet intelligence collection facility, less than a hundred miles from our coast, is the largest of its kind in the world. The acres and acres of antennae fields and intelligence monitors are targeted on key U.S. military installations and sensitive activities. The installation in Lourdes, Cuba, is manned by 1,500 Soviet technicians. And the satellite ground station allows instant communications with Moscow. This 28-square-mile facility has grown by more than 60 percent in size and capability during the past decade.

In western Cuba, we see this military airfield and its complement of modern, Soviet-built Mig-23 aircraft. The Soviet Union uses this Cuban airfield for its own long-range reconnaissance missions. And earlier this month, two modern Soviet antisubmarine warfare aircraft began operating from it. During the past 2 years, the level of Soviet arms exports to Cuba can only be compared to the levels reached during the Cuban missile crisis 20 years ago.

This third photo, which is the only one in this series that has been previously made public, shows Soviet military hardware that has made its way to Central America. This airfield with its MI-8 helicopters, anti-aircraft guns, and protected fighter sites is one of a number of military facilities in Nicaragua which has received Soviet equipment funneled through Cuba, and reflects the massive military buildup going on in that country.

On the small island of Grenada, at the southern end of the Caribbean chain, the Cubans, with Soviet financing and backing, are in the process of building an airfield with a 10,000-foot runway. Grenada doesn't even have an air force. Who is it intended for? The Caribbean is a very important passageway for our international commerce and military lines of communication. More than half of all American oil imports now pass through the Caribbean. The rapid buildup of Grenada's military potential is unrelated to any conceivable threat to this island country of under 110,000 people and totally at odds with the pattern of other eastern Caribbean States, most of which are unarmed.

The Soviet-Cuban militarization of Grenada, in short, can only be seen as power projection into the region. And it is in this important economic and strategic area that we're trying to help the Governments of El Salvador, Costa Rica, Honduras, and others in their struggles for democracy against guerrillas supported through Cuba and Nicaragua.

These pictures only tell a small part of the story. I wish I could show you more without compromising our most sensitive intelligence sources and methods. But the Soviet Union is also supporting Cuban military forces in Angola and Ethiopia. They have bases in Ethiopia and South Yemen, near the Persian Gulf oil fields. They've taken over the port that we built at Cam Ranh Bay in Vietnam. And now for the first time in history, the Soviet Navy is a force to be reckoned with in the South Pacific.

Some people may still ask: Would the Soviets ever use their formidable military power? Well, again, can we afford to believe they won't? There is Afghanistan. And in Poland, the Soviets denied the will of the people and in so doing demonstrated to the world how their military power could also be used to intimidate.

The final fact is that the Soviet Union is acquiring what can only be considered an offensive military force. They have continued to build far more intercontinental ballistic missiles than they could possibly need simply to deter an attack. Their conventional forces are trained and equipped not so much to defend against an attack as they are to permit sudden, surprise offensives of their own.

Our NATO allies have assumed a great defense burden, including the military draft in most countries. We're working with them and our other friends around the world to do more. Our defensive strategy means we need military forces that can move very quickly, forces that are trained and ready to respond to any emergency.

Every item in our defense program—our ships, our tanks, our planes, our funds for training and spare parts—is intended for one all-important purpose: to keep the peace. Unfortunately, a decade of neglecting our military forces had called into question our ability to do that.

When I took office in January 1981, I was appalled by what I found: American planes that couldn't fly and American ships that couldn't sail for lack of spare parts and trained personnel and insufficient fuel and ammunition for essential training. The inevitable result of all this was poor morale in our Armed Forces, difficulty in recruiting the brightest young Americans to wear the uniform, and difficulty in convincing our most experienced military personnel to stay on.

There was a real question then about how well we could meet a crisis. And it was obvious that we had to begin a major modernization program to ensure we could deter aggression and preserve the peace in the years ahead.

We had to move immediately to improve the basic readiness and staying power of our conventional forces, so they could meet—and therefore help deter—a crisis. We had to make up for lost years of investment by moving forward with a long-term plan to prepare our forces to counter the military capabilities our adversaries were developing for the future.

I know that all of you want peace, and so do I. I know too that many of you seriously believe that a nuclear freeze would further the cause of peace. But a freeze now would make us less, not more, secure and would raise, not reduce, the risks of war. It would be largely unverifiable and would seriously undercut our negotiations on arms reduction. It would reward the Soviets for their massive military buildup while preventing us from modernizing our aging and increasingly vulnerable forces. With their present margin of superiority, why should they agree to arms reductions knowing that we were prohibited from catching up?

Believe me, it wasn't pleasant for someone who had come to Washington determined to reduce government spending, but we had to move forward with the task of repairing our defenses or we would lose our ability to deter conflict now and in the future. We had to demonstrate to any adversary that aggression could not succeed, and that the only real solution was substantial, equitable, and effectively verifiable arms reduction—the kind we're working for right now in Geneva.³

Thanks to your strong support, and bipartisan support from the Congress, we began to turn things around. Already, we're seeing some very encouraging results. Quality recruitment and retention are up dramatically—more high school graduates are choosing military careers, and more experienced career personnel are choosing to stay. Our men and women in uniform at last are getting the tools and training they need to do their jobs.

Ask around today, especially among our young people, and I think you will find a whole new attitude toward serving their country. This reflects more than just better pay, equipment, and leadership. You the

³ The current round of START negotiations resumed in Geneva on February 2. On January 21, from 9:35 until 10:20 a.m. the President met with Rowny and Nitze, in addition to Bush, Shultz, Weinberger, Adelman, Clark, McFarlane, James Baker, and Meese, to discuss both the upcoming INF and START negotiations. (Reagan Library, President's Daily Diary) In a statement released that day, Reagan noted: "Our proposals for massive reductions in strategic arsenals and for the elimination of an entire class of nuclear missiles in the intermediate nuclear forces deserve the support of all who seek genuine arms reductions. The coming round of the negotiations is particularly important, because our far-reaching proposals combined with our defense modernization programs provide a strong incentive for reaching agreements on lower levels of forces on an equitable and verifiable basis." (Public Papers: Reagan, 1983, Book I, p. 85)

American people have sent a signal to these young people that it is once again an honor to wear the uniform. That's not something you measure in a budget, but it's a very real part of our nation's strength.

It'll take us longer to build the kind of equipment we need to keep peace in the future, but we've made a good start.

We haven't built a new long-range bomber for 21 years. Now we're building the B-1. We hadn't launched one new strategic submarine for 17 years. Now we're building one Trident submarine a year. Our land-based missiles are increasingly threatened by the many huge, new Soviet ICBM's. We're determining how to solve that problem. At the same time, we're working in the START and INF negotiations with the goal of achieving deep reductions in the strategic and intermediate nuclear arsenals of both sides.

We have also begun the long-needed modernization of our conventional forces. The Army is getting its first new tank in 20 years. The Air Force is modernizing. We're rebuilding our Navy, which shrank from about a thousand ships in the late 1960's to 453 during the 1970's. Our nation needs a superior navy to support our military forces and vital interests overseas. We're now on the road to achieving a 600-ship navy and increasing the amphibious capabilities of our marines, who are now serving the cause of peace in Lebanon. And we're building a real capability to assist our friends in the vitally important Indian Ocean and Persian Gulf region.

This adds up to a major effort, and it isn't cheap. It comes at a time when there are many other pressures on our budget and when the American people have already had to make major sacrifices during the recession. But we must not be misled by those who would make defense once again the scapegoat of the Federal budget.

The fact is that in the past few decades we have seen a dramatic shift in how we spend the taxpayer's dollar. Back in 1955, payments to individuals took up only about 20 percent of the Federal budget. For nearly three decades, these payments steadily increased and, this year, will account for 49 percent of the budget. By contrast, in 1955 defense took up more than half of the Federal budget. By 1980 this spending had fallen to a low of 23 percent. Even with the increase that I am requesting this year, defense will still amount to only 28 percent of the budget.

The calls for cutting back the defense budget come in nice, simple arithmetic. They're the same kind of talk that led the democracies to neglect their defenses in the 1930's and invited the tragedy of World War II. We must not let that grim chapter of history repeat itself through apathy or neglect.

This is why I'm speaking to you tonight—to urge you to tell your Senators and Congressmen that you know we must continue to restore our military strength. If we stop in midstream, we will send a signal of decline, of lessened will, to friends and adversaries alike. Free people must voluntarily, through open debate and democratic means, meet the challenge that totalitarians pose by compulsion. It's up to us, in our time, to choose and choose wisely between the hard but necessary task of preserving peace and freedom and the temptation to ignore our duty and blindly hope for the best while the enemies of freedom grow stronger day by day.

The solution is well within our grasp. But to reach it, there is simply no alternative but to continue this year, in this budget, to provide the resources we need to preserve the peace and guarantee our freedom.

Now, thus far tonight I've shared with you my thoughts on the problems of national security we must face together. My predecessors in the Oval Office have appeared before you on other occasions to describe the threat posed by Soviet power and have proposed steps to address that threat. But since the advent of nuclear weapons, those steps have been increasingly directed toward deterrence of aggression through the promise of retaliation.

This approach to stability through offensive threat has worked. We and our allies have succeeded in preventing nuclear war for more than three decades. In recent months, however, my advisers, including in particular the Joint Chiefs of Staff, have underscored the necessity to break out of a future that relies solely on offensive retaliation for our security.

Over the course of these discussions, I've become more and more deeply convinced that the human spirit must be capable of rising above dealing with other nations and human beings by threatening their existence. Feeling this way, I believe we must thoroughly examine every opportunity for reducing tensions and for introducing greater stability into the strategic calculus on both sides.

One of the most important contributions we can make is, of course, to lower the level of all arms, and particularly nuclear arms. We're engaged right now in several negotiations with the Soviet Union to bring about a mutual reduction of weapons. I will report to you a week from tomorrow my thoughts on that score.⁴ But let me just say, I'm totally committed to this course.

If the Soviet Union will join with us in our effort to achieve major arms reduction, we will have succeeded in stabilizing the nuclear balance. Nevertheless, it will still be necessary to rely on the specter of retaliation, on mutual threat. And that's a sad commentary on the human condition. Wouldn't it be better to save lives than to avenge them? Are we not capable of demonstrating our peaceful intentions by applying all our abilities and our ingenuity to achieving a truly lasting stability? I think we are. Indeed, we must.

After careful consultation with my advisers, including the Joint Chiefs of Staff, I believe there is a way. Let me share with you a vision of the future which offers hope. It is that we embark on a program to counter the awesome Soviet missile threat with measures that are defensive. Let us turn to the very strengths in technology that spawned our great industrial base and that have given us the quality of life we enjoy today.

What if free people could live secure in the knowledge that their security did not rest upon the threat of instant U.S. retaliation to deter a Soviet attack, that we could intercept and destroy strategic ballistic missiles before they reached our own soil or that of our allies?

I know this is a formidable, technical task, one that may not be accomplished before the end of this century. Yet, current technology has attained a level of sophistication where it's reasonable for us to begin this effort. It will take years, probably decades of effort on many fronts. There will be failures and setbacks, just as there will be successes and breakthroughs. And as we proceed, we must remain constant in preserving the nuclear deterrent and maintaining a solid capability for flexible response. But isn't it worth every investment necessary to free the world from the threat of nuclear war? We know it is.

In the meantime, we will continue to pursue real reductions in nuclear arms, negotiating from a position of strength that can be ensured only by modernizing our strategic forces. At the same time, we must take steps to reduce the risk of a conventional military conflict escalating to nuclear war by improving our nonnuclear capabilities.

America does possess—now—the technologies to attain very significant improvements in the effectiveness of our conventional, non-nuclear forces. Proceeding boldly with these new technologies, we can significantly reduce any incentive that the Soviet Union may have to threaten attack against the United States or its allies.

As we pursue our goal of defensive technologies, we recognize that our allies rely upon our strategic offensive power to deter attacks against them. Their vital interests and ours are inextricably linked. Their safety and ours are one. And no change in technology can or will alter that reality. We must and shall continue to honor our commitments.

I clearly recognize that defensive systems have limitations and raise certain problems and ambiguities. If paired with offensive systems, they can be viewed as fostering an aggressive policy, and no one wants that. But with these considerations firmly in mind, I call upon the scientific community in our country, those who gave us nuclear weapons, to turn their great talents now to the cause of mankind and world peace, to give us the means of rendering these nuclear weapons impotent and obsolete.

Tonight, consistent with our obligations of the ABM treaty and recognizing the need for closer consultation with our allies, I'm taking an important first step. I am directing a comprehensive and intensive effort to define a long-term research and development program to begin to achieve our ultimate goal of eliminating the threat posed by strategic nuclear missiles. This could pave the way for arms control measures to eliminate the weapons themselves. We seek neither military superiority nor political advantage. Our only purpose—one all people share—is to search for ways to reduce the danger of nuclear war.

My fellow Americans, tonight we're launching an effort which holds the promise of changing the course of human history. There will be risks, and results take time. But I believe we can do it. As we cross this threshold, I ask for your prayers and your support.

Thank you, good night, and God bless you.

146. Remarks by President Reagan¹

Los Angeles, March 31, 1983

Remarks and a Question-and-Answer Session at the Los Angeles World Affairs Council Luncheon in California

The President. Thank you, Dr. Singleton,² the president, and presidents past, and distinguished guests, and you ladies and gentlemen, thank you all for a very warm welcome. I can tell you that our eyes turn westward constantly in Washington. The only problem with coming out here is it's so hard to go back. [Laughter]

Last week, I spoke to the American people about our plans for safeguarding this nation's security and that of our allies.³ And I announced a long-term effort in scientific research to counter someday the menace of offensive nuclear missiles. What I have proposed is that nations should turn their best energies to moving away from the nuclear nightmare. We must not resign ourselves to a future in which security on both sides depends on threatening the lives of millions of innocent men, women, and children. And today, I would like to discuss another vital aspect of our national security: our efforts to limit and reduce the danger of modern weaponry.

We live in a world in which total war would mean catastrophe. We also live in a world that's torn by a great moral struggle between democracy and its enemies, between the spirit of freedom and those who fear freedom.

In the last 15 years or more, the Soviet Union has engaged in a relentless military buildup, overtaking and surpassing the United States in major categories of military power, acquiring what can only be considered an offensive military capability. All the moral values which this country cherishes—freedom, democracy, the right of peoples and nations to determine their own destiny, to speak and write, to live and worship as they choose—all these basic rights are fundamentally challenged by a powerful adversary which does not wish these values to survive.

This is our dilemma, and it's a profound one. We must both defend freedom and preserve the peace. We must stand true to our principles and our friends while preventing a holocaust.

The Western commitment to peace through strength has given Europe its longest period of peace in a century. We cannot conduct ourselves as if the special danger of nuclear weapons did not exist. But we must not allow ourselves to be paralyzed by the problem, to abdicate our moral duty. This is the challenge that history has left us.

We of the 20th century who so pride ourselves on mastering even the forces of nature—except last week when the Queen was here⁴—[laughter]—we're forced to wrestle with one of the most complex moral challenges ever faced by any generation. Now, my views about the Soviet Union are well known, although, sometimes I don't recognize them when they're played back to me. [Laughter] And our program for maintaining, strengthening, and modernizing our national defense has been clearly stated. Today, let me tell you something of what we're doing to reduce the danger of nuclear war.

⁴ Queen Elizabeth paid an official visit to the United States, February 26–March 7, traveling to San Diego, Palm Springs, Los Angeles, Santa Barbara, San Francisco, Yosemite National Park, and Seattle. She visited the President and First Lady at their ranch—Rancho del Cielo—near Santa Barbara on March 1. On March 3, the President hosted a State dinner for the Queen at the M.H. DeYoung Memorial Museum in San Francisco. (Reagan Library, President's Daily Diary) The text of the President's and the Queen's toasts are printed in Public Papers: Reagan, 1983, Book I, pp. 326–328.

Since the end of World War II the United States has been the leader in the international effort to negotiate nuclear arms limitations. In 1946, when the United States was the only country in the world possessing these awesome weapons, we did not blackmail others with threats to use them, nor did we use our enormous power to conquer territory, to advance our position, or to seek domination. Doesn't our record alone refute the charge that we seek superiority, that we represent a threat to peace?

We proposed the Baruch plan for international control of all nuclear weapons and nuclear energy, for everything nuclear to be turned over to an international agency.⁵ And this was rejected by the Soviet Union. Several years later, in 1955, President Eisenhower presented his "open skies" proposal, that the United States and the Soviet Union would exchange blueprints of military establishments and permit aerial reconnaissance to ensure against the danger of surprise attack.⁶ This, too, was rejected by the Soviet Union.

Now, since then, some progress has been made, largely at American initiative. The 1963 Limited Test Ban Treaty prohibited nuclear testing in the atmosphere, in outer space, or under water.⁷ The creation of the "Hot Line" in 1963, upgraded in 1971, provides direct communication between Washington and Moscow to avoid miscalculation during a crisis.⁸ The Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty of 1968 sought to prevent the spread of nuclear weapons.⁹ In 1971 we reached an agreement on special communication procedures to safeguard against accidental or unauthorized use of nuclear weapons and on a seabed arms control treaty, which prohibits the placing of nuclear weapons on the seabed of the ocean floor.¹⁰ The Strategic Arms Limitation Agreements of 1972 imposed limits on antiballistic missile systems and on numbers of strategic, offensive missiles. And the 1972 Biological Warfare Convention bans—or was supposed to ban—the development, production, and stockpiling of biological and toxin weapons.¹¹

⁶ See footnote 10, Document 106.

⁷ See footnote 11, Document 106.

⁸ See footnote 3, Document 127.

⁹ See footnote 12, Document 106.

¹⁰ The Agreement on Measures to Reduce the Risk of Outbreak of Nuclear War (22 UST 1590), was signed in Washington on September 30, 1971, and entered into force that day. The Treaty on the Prohibition of the Emplacement of Nuclear Weapons and Other Weapons of Mass Destruction on the Sea-Bed and the Ocean Floor and in the Subsoil Thereof (23 UST 701) was opened for signature in Washington, London, and Moscow on February 11, 1971, and entered into force on May 18, 1972.

¹¹ See footnote 6, Document 56.

But while many agreements have been reached, we've also suffered many disappointments.

The American people had hoped, by these measures, to reduce tensions and start to build a constructive relationship with the Soviet Union. Instead, we have seen Soviet military arsenals continue to grow in virtually every significant category. We've seen the Soviet Union project its power around the globe. We've seen Soviet resistance to significant reductions and measures of effective verification, especially the latter. And, I'm sorry to say, there have been increasingly serious grounds for questioning their compliance with the arms control agreements that have already been signed and that we've both pledged to uphold. I may have more to say on this in the near future.

Coming into office, I made two promises to the American people about peace and security. I promised to restore our neglected defenses, in order to strengthen and preserve the peace, and I promised to pursue reliable agreements to reduce nuclear weapons. Both these promises are being kept.

Today, not only the peace but also the chances for real arms control depend on restoring the military balance. We know that the ideology of the Soviet leaders does not permit them to leave any Western weakness unprobed, any vacuum of power unfilled. It would seem that to them negotiation is only another form of struggle. Yet, I believe the Soviets can be persuaded to reduce their arsenals—but only if they see it's absolutely necessary. Only if they recognize the West's determination to modernize its own military forces will they see an incentive to negotiate a verifiable agreement establishing equal, lower levels. And, very simply, that is one of the main reasons why we must rebuild our defensive strength.

All of our strategic force modernization has been approved by the Congress except for the land-based leg of the Triad. We expect to get congressional approval on this final program later this spring. A strategic forces modernization program depends on a national, bipartisan consensus. Over the last decade, four successive administrations have made proposals for arms control and modernization that have become embroiled in political controversy. No one gained from this divisiveness; all of us are going to have to take a fresh look at our previous positions. I pledge to you my participation in such a fresh look and my determination to assist in forging a renewed, bipartisan consensus.

My other national security priority on assuming office was to thoroughly reexamine the entire arms control agenda. Since then, in coordination with our allies, we've launched the most comprehensive program of arms control initiatives ever undertaken. Never before in history has a nation engaged in so many major simultaneous efforts to limit and reduce the instruments of war.

Last month in Geneva the Vice President committed the United States to negotiate a total and verifiable ban on chemical weapons.¹² Such inhumane weapons, as well as toxin weapons, are being used in violation of international law in Afghanistan, in Laos, and Kampuchea.

Together with our allies, we've offered a comprehensive, new proposal for mutual and balanced reduction of conventional forces in Europe.¹³

We have recently proposed to the Soviet Union a series of further measures to reduce the risk of war from accident or miscalculation.¹⁴ And we're considering significant new measures resulting in part from consultations with several distinguished Senators.

We've joined our allies in proposing a Conference on Disarmament in Europe. On the basis of a balanced outcome of the Madrid meeting, such a conference will discuss new ways to enhance European stability and security.¹⁵

We have proposed to the Soviet Union improving the verification provisions of two agreements to limit underground nuclear testing, but, so far, the response has been negative. We will continue to try.

And, most importantly, we have made far-reaching proposals, which I will discuss further in a moment, for deep reductions in strategic weapons and for elimination of an entire class of intermediate-range weapons.

I am determined to achieve real arms control—reliable agreements that will stand the test of time, not cosmetic agreements that raise expectations only to have hopes cruelly dashed.

¹² In his February 4 address before the UN Committee on Disarmament in Geneva, Bush, in reference to chemical weapons, stated: "The United States has already called upon the Soviet Union and its allies to stop immediately their illegal use of these weapons. I repeat that call here today. And I urge the Soviet Union and all other members of the committee to join the United States in negotiating a complete and effective and verifiable ban on the development, production, stockpiling, and transfer of chemical weapons, a ban that will insure that these horrors can never occur again. A complete, effective, and verifiable ban on chemical weapons is long overdue. My government, therefore, would like to see the work of this committee accelerate and negotiations undertaken on a treaty to eliminate the threat posed by chemical weapons." (Department of State Bulletin, March 1983, p. 16)

¹⁵ Reference is to the ongoing CSCE Madrid Review Conference, at which the Conference on Disarmament, scheduled to take place in Stockholm in 1984, was discussed.

In all these negotiations certain basic principles guide our policy. First, our efforts to control arms should seek reductions on both sides—significant reductions. Second, we insist that arms control agreements be equal and balanced. Third, arms control agreements must be effectively verifiable. We cannot gamble with the safety of our people and the people of the world. Fourth, we recognize that arms control is not an end in itself, but a vital part of a broad policy designed to strengthen peace and stability. It's with these firm principles in mind that this administration has approached negotiations on the most powerful weapons in the American and Soviet arsenals—strategic nuclear weapons.

In June of 1982 American and Soviet negotiators convened in Geneva to begin the Strategic Arms Reductions Talks, what we call START. We've sought to work out an agreement reducing the levels of strategic weapons on both sides. I proposed reducing the number of ballistic missiles by one-half and the number of warheads by one-third. No more than half the remaining warheads could be on land-based missiles. This would leave both sides with greater security at equal and lower levels of forces. Not only would this reduce numbers; it would also put specific limits on precisely those types of nuclear weapons that pose the most danger.

The Soviets have made a counterproposal. We've raised a number of serious concerns about it. But—and this is important—they have accepted the concept of reductions. Now, I expect this is because of the firm resolve that we have demonstrated. In the current round of negotiations, we've presented them with the basic elements of a treaty for comprehensive reductions in strategic arsenals.¹⁶ The United States also has, in START, recently proposed a draft agreement on a number of significant measures to build confidence and reduce the risks of conflict.¹⁷ This negotiation is proceeding under the able leadership of Ambassador Edward Romney on our side—Edward Rowny, I should say, is on our side.

We're also negotiating in Geneva to eliminate an entire class of new weapons from the face of the Earth. Since the end of the mid-1970's, the Soviet Union has been deploying an intermediate-range nuclear missile, the SS-20, at a rate of one a week. There are now 351 of these missiles, each with three highly accurate warheads capable of destroying cities and military bases in Western Europe, Asia, and the Middle East.

NATO has no comparable weapon, nor did NATO in any way provoke this new, unprecedented escalation. In fact, while the Soviets were deploying their SS–20's we were taking a thousand nuclear warheads from shorter range weapons out of Europe.

¹⁶ See footnote 3, Document 145.

¹⁷ In telegram 2293 from the START Delegation in Geneva, March 8, the Mission transmitted the text of Rowny's statement made in plenary session March 8, in which he noted that he would table, later that day, a proposed agreement on confidence-building measures. (Department of State, Central Foreign Policy File, Electronic Telegrams, D830128-0179)

This major shift in the European military balance prompted our West European allies themselves to propose that NATO find a means of righting the balance. And in December of '79, they announced collective two-track decision. First, to deploy in Western Europe 572 land-based cruise missiles and Pershing II ballistic missiles, capable of reaching the Soviet Union. The purpose: to offset and deter the Soviet SS–20's. The first of those NATO weapons are schedule for deployment by the end of this year. Second, to seek negotiations with the Soviet Union for the mutual reduction of these intermediate-range missiles.

In November of 1981 the United States, in concert with our allies, made a sweeping new proposal: NATO would cancel its own deployment if the Soviets eliminated theirs. The Soviet Union refused and set out to intensify public pressures in the West to block the NATO deployment, which has not even started. Meanwhile, the Soviet weapons continue to grow in number.

Our proposal was not made on a take-it-or-leave-it basis. We're willing to consider any Soviet proposal that meets these standards of fairness. An agreement must establish equal numbers for both Soviet and American intermediate-range nuclear forces. Other countries' nuclear forces, such as the British and French, are independent and are not part of the bilateral U.S.-Soviet negotiations. They are, in fact, strategic weapons, and the Soviet strategic arsenal more than compensates for them. Next, an agreement must not shift the threat from Europe to Asia. Given the range in mobility of the SS–20's, meaningful limits on these and comparable American systems must be global. An agreement must be effectively verifiable. And an agreement must not undermine NATO's ability to defend itself with conventional forces.

We've been consulting closely with our Atlantic allies, and they strongly endorse these principles.

Earlier this week, I authorized our negotiator in Geneva, Ambassador Paul Nitze, to inform the Soviet delegation of a new American proposal which has the full support of our allies.¹⁸ We're prepared to negotiate an interim agreement to reduce our planned deployment if the Soviet Union will reduce their corresponding warheads to an equal level. This would include all U.S. and Soviet weapons of this class, wherever they're located.

¹⁸ On March 30, the President spoke before NATO ambassadors and U.S. officials assembled in the East Room of the White House. In his remarks, Reagan indicated that Nitze had conveyed the proposal that the United States was "prepared to negotiate an interim agreement in which the United States would substantially reduce its planned deployment of Pershing II and ground-launched cruise missiles, provided the Soviet Union reduce the number of its warheads on longer range INF missiles to an equal level on a global basis." Reagan noted that Nitze had "explained that the United States views this proposal as a serious initial step toward the total elimination of this class of weapons. And he has conveyed my hope that the Soviet Union will join us in this view. Our proposal for the entire elimination of these systems remains on the table." (Public Papers: Reagan, 1983, Book II, p. 474)

Our offer of zero on both sides will, of course, remain on the table as our ultimate goal. At the same time, we remain open—as we have been from the very outset—to serious counterproposals. The Soviet negotiators have now returned to Moscow, where we hope our new proposal will receive careful consideration during the recess. Ambassador Nitze has proposed and the Soviets have agreed that negotiations resume in mid-May, several weeks earlier than scheduled.¹⁹

I'm sorry that the Soviet Union, so far, has not been willing to accept the complete elimination of these systems on both sides. The question I now put to the Soviet Government is: If not elimination, to what equal level are you willing to reduce? The new proposal is designed to promote early and genuine progress at Geneva.

For arms control to be truly complete and world security strengthened, however, we must also increase our efforts to halt the spread of nuclear arms. Every country that values a peaceful world order must play its part.

Our allies, as important nuclear exporters, also have a very important responsibility to prevent the spread of nuclear arms. To advance this goal, we should all adopt comprehensive safeguards as a condition for nuclear supply commitments that we make in the future. In the days ahead, I'll be talking to other world leaders about the need for urgent movement on this and other measures against nuclear proliferation.

Now, that's the arms control agenda we've been pursuing. Our proposals are fair. They're far-reaching and comprehensive. But we still have a long way to go.

We Americans are sometimes an impatient people. I guess it's a symptom of our traditional optimism, energy, and spirit. Often, this is a source of strength. In a negotiation, however, impatience can be a real handicap. Any of you who've been involved in labor-management negotiations or any kind of bargaining know that patience strengthens your bargaining position. If one side seems too eager or desperate, the other side has no reason to offer a compromise and every reason to hold back, expecting that the more eager side will cave in first.

Well, this is a basic fact of life we can't afford to lose sight of when dealing with the Soviet Union. Generosity in negotiation has never been a trademark of theirs. It runs counter to the basic militancy of Marxist-Leninist ideology. So, it's vital that we show patience, determination, and above all, national unity. If we appear to be divided, if the Soviets suspect that domestic political pressure will undercut our position, they'll dig in their heels. And that can only delay an agreement and may destroy all hope for an agreement.

That's why I've been concerned about the nuclear freeze proposals, one of which is being considered at this time by the House of Representatives.²⁰ Most of those who support the freeze, I'm sure, are well intentioned, concerned about the arms race and the danger of nuclear war. No one shares their concern more than I do. But however well intentioned they are, these freeze proposals would do more harm than good. They may seem to offer a simple solution. But there are no simple solutions to complex problems. As H. L. Mencken once wryly remarked, he said, "For every problem, there's one solution which is simple, neat, and wrong." [Laughter]

The freeze concept is dangerous for many reasons. It would preserve today's high, unequal, and unstable levels of nuclear forces, and, by so doing, reduce Soviet incentives to negotiate for real reductions.

It would pull the rug out from under our negotiators in Geneva, as they have testified. After all, why should the Soviets negotiate if they've already achieved a freeze in a position of advantage to them?

Also, some think a freeze would be easy to agree on, but it raises enormously complicated problems of what is to be frozen, how it is to be achieved and, most of all, verified. Attempting to negotiate these critical details would only divert us from the goal of negotiating reductions for who knows how long.

The freeze proposal would also make a lot more sense if a similar movement against nuclear weapons were putting similar pressures on Soviet leaders in Moscow. As former Secretary of Defense Harold Brown has pointed out, the effect of the freeze "is to put pressure on the United States, but not on the Soviet Union."

Finally, the freeze would reward the Soviets for their 15-year buildup while locking us into our existing equipment, which in many cases is obsolete and badly in need of modernization. Three-quarters of Soviet strategic warheads are on delivery systems 5 years old or less. Three-quarters of the American Strategic warheads are on delivery systems 15 years old or older. The time comes when everything wears out.

²⁰Reference is to H.J. Res. 13, drafted by Stephen Solarz (D–New York) and approved by the House Foreign Affairs Committee on March 8, which called on the United States and Soviet Union to pursue a mutual and verifiable freeze and to include negotiations on the reduction of intermediate-range weapons within START.

The trouble is it comes a lot sooner for us than for them. And, under a freeze, we couldn't do anything about it.

Our B-52 bombers are older than many of the pilots who fly them. If they were automobiles, they'd qualify as antiques. A freeze could lock us into obsolescence. It's asking too much to expect our service men and women to risk their lives in obsolete equipment. The 2 million patriotic Americans in the armed services deserve the best and most modern equipment to protect them and us.

I'm sure that every President has dreamt of leaving the world a safer place than he found it. I pledge to you, my goal—and I consider it a sacred trust—will be to make progress toward arms reductions in every one of the several negotiations now underway.

I call on all Americans of both parties and all branches of government to join in this effort. We must not let our disagreements or partisan politics keep us from strengthening the peace and reducing armaments.

I pledge to our allies and friends in Europe and Asia, we will continue to consult with you closely. We're conscious of our responsibility when we negotiate with our adversaries on conditions of—or issues of concern to you and your safety and well-being.

To the leaders and people of the Soviet Union, I say, join us in the path to a more peaceful, secure world. Let us vie in the realm of ideas, on the field of peaceful competition. Let history record that we tested our theories through human experience, not that we destroyed ourselves in the name of vindicating our way of life. And let us practice restraint in our international conduct, so that the present climate of mistrust can some day give way to mutual confidence and a secure peace.

What better time to rededicate ourselves to this undertaking than in the Easter season, when millions of the world's people pay homage to the One who taught us, peace of Earth, good will toward men?

This is the goal, my fellow Americans, of all the democratic nations—a goal that requires firmness, patience, and understanding. If the Soviet Union responds in the same spirit, we're ready. And we can pass on to our posterity the gift of peace—that and freedom are the greatest gifts that one generation can bequeath to another.

Thank you, and God bless you.

147. Personal Note Prepared by the Deputy Secretary of State (Dam)¹

Washington, April 6, 1983

The highlight of the day was the Secretary's meeting at 4 o'clock with the President.² Bill Clark, Jim Baker and Ed Meese were there. The subject was relations with the Soviet Union. We are now reaching a point where we have to decide what we want our relations with the Soviet Union to be during the remainder of this Administration. If the President is to meet with Andropov before the end of this term, that probably means that it must be done early next year in order to avoid the election season. Working back from then, it means that, if we want the summit to deal with substance and to be a well-prepared summit, a number of things must be set in motion soon.

The Soviets, of course, want to have relations to do largely with arms control, but paradoxically enough, they are not willing to make any concessions on that subject. We in turn would like to have our relations heavily involved in regional matters, particularly Afghanistan, Poland and Cambodia, where the Soviet Union is doing great mischief and harm to innocent third countries. Therefore, we must find some other areas in which there is some opportunity for progress.

There are a number of possible bilateral matters. One is cultural affairs, where the Soviets are able to tour the United States freely upon invitation from private Americans, but there is very little opportunity for the United States to have any contact with Soviet citizens, whether it be in art, music or USIA-type activities. Therefore, a cultural agreement is one possibility. Another possibility is an opening of a consulate in Kiev and a reciprocal consulate in New York, but this initiative has been shelved, because this, like the cultural agreement apparently, is one of the Afghanistan sanctions. Another possibility has to do with a long-term grain agreement, although it is not clear who is the demander in this situation, since the Congress is about to push a long-term grain agreement down our throat.³ This was the subject matter of the meeting, but the most immediate question was what will happen in a forthcoming meeting, perhaps tomorrow, with Ambassador Dobrynin.⁴ (The President decided not to go forward with the cultural agreement or the consulate at the meeting with Dobrynin.)

³ In an April 22 statement, the President indicated that the United States had proposed to the Soviet Union the negotiation of a new long-term grain agreement: "Negotiation of a new long-term agreement is consistent with United States agricultural export policy and reflects our commitment to reestablish the U.S. as a reliable supplier." (Public Papers: Reagan, 1983, Book I, p. 575)

We had an interesting meeting with an outside informal advisory group. This was the second meeting of the group, which included Abshire and Korologos, as before.⁵ However, Harlow was ill and not able to be present, but Bill Timmons was here. The questions had to do with what should be the priorities during the remainder of this term and particularly what problems may arise either in politics or in connection with the White House and the White House staff. All of these people are extremely well versed in these matters. It was a most stimulating meeting.

I had an interesting meeting with Paul Nitze at 1 o'clock this afternoon. We reviewed not only the situation with regard to INF and START but also the bureaucracies of the problems on the START delegation. Ambassador Rowny went in closed session before the Foreign Relations Committee this morning and gave his explanation of his "hit list," and it is clear that his explanation did not really satisfy the committee.⁶ Beyond that, both the Republicans and Democrats came out of the meeting, in which both Nitze and Rowny testified, with the information that no progress was being made in the negotiations. The Democrats blamed this on the Administration, and the Republicans, represented by Senator Percy, blamed it on the Soviets. Nevertheless, I am told that this played quite harshly on the evening television.

These were the leading meetings of the day, although there were a great number of other meetings of various kinds. It is interesting that after a drought of about three or four days in which things were very quiet, activity exploded today, and tomorrow promises to be another very heavy day. There are certainly ups and downs in this business, and the problem is to use one's time on relatively free days productively. I tend to use it on light days to catch up on my reading, but even there it is hard to know where to put my priorities. There are so many telegrams and memoranda which one can read that it is very hard to sort out one's priorities. Indeed, priorities with regard to use of time are perhaps the most difficult aspects of my entire job.

⁴ Documentation on the meeting is in Foreign Relations, 1981–1988, vol. IV, Soviet Union, January 1983–March 1985, Documents 38 and 39.

⁵ In a note dictated on March 30, Dam indicated that he, Shultz, and Eagleburger had met with Tom Korologos, Bryce Harlow, and David Abshire: "The purpose was to discuss the Congressional and public relations aspects of diplomacy. Henry Kissinger had a similar group, including some of the same people, during his period as Secretary of State. The problems now are different, and Henry started the process at a time when he was in very serious trouble. Conversely, George Shultz started these meetings (at least on the assumption that there is more than one, which I believe there will be) at a time when his prestige is at an unbelievable high. Obviously he is going to run into problems with the press and with the public, or otherwise he wouldn't be a particularly effective Secretary of State because he wouldn't be taking on fully difficult issues. Also, the problems are necessarily different." (Department of State, D Files, Deputy Secretary Dam's Official Files: Lot 85D308, Personal Notes of Deputy Secretary—Kenneth W. Dam—Oct. 1982–Sept. 1983)

Washington, April 6, 1983

SUBJECT

Foreign Policy Directions Project

The Foreign Policy Directions exercise is now underway.² Working with the regional and functional bureaus, we have organized the program in three clusters to reflect our central global objectives. These are:

- I. Promoting Economic Recovery and Growth
- II. Enhancing Western Security
- III. Managing U.S. Global Interests

Under each of these headings, we will be undertaking a series of policy studies, designed to clarify and advance our long-term objectives and sort out implications for U.S. action.

In the initial round, we are working with appropriate bureaus on seven studies. The papers will be fully cleared, but we have asked that differences of view among bureaus be highlighted rather than compromised in order to illuminate policy alternatives. Annotated outlines of the papers will be provided to S/P in two weeks; we are to receive final papers from the bureaus by May 1.

² See Document 123.

Attached is a summary of the initial work program and of prospective policy studies. As the work progresses, we will try to set up one or more seminars with you and other Seventh Floor principals to discuss the analysis and conclusions. Meanwhile, I would greatly welcome your comments on any of these subjects and suggestions for other topics.

Summary Prepared in the Policy Planning Council³

Washington, undated

INITIAL WORK PROGRAM

1. Economic Policy Convergence:

How should we shape discussions among Summit countries as the focus of our consultations expands from containing inflation to managing stable growth?

2. Trade-Finance:

What shape is the global matrix of trade and financial flows likely to take over the next five years, and what major policy issues are posed by such patterns for the international economy and U.S. policy?

3. Arms Control:

How can we insure that the arms control process serves U.S. interests regardless of whether agreements ensue?

4. U.S.-USSR-China Relations:

What should be our strategy toward this triangular relationship?

5. How Can We Improve Multilateral Diplomacy—both in UN/NAM/G-77 diplomacy and with other international groups.

In addition, OES has agreed to take a fresh look at our nuclear non-proliferation policy and S/P will initiate an in-house look at the lessons of Iran, especially the issues of modernization vs. traditional values in promoting political stability.

Additional Policy Studies

I. Promoting Economic Recovery and Growth

1. How can we establish a system of trade rules and negotiations that works?

³Secret. Drafted by Ruth Whiteside (S/P) on April 6.

2. Objectives of energy cooperation among the major industrial countries?

II. Enhancing Western Security

1. How can we strengthen allied political cooperation?
2. How can we best sustain vital U.S. and allied defense programs?

III. Managing U.S. Global Interests

1. Strategies toward key regional crises this year and next should existing policies fall short of success.

2. Developing more effective multilateral consultations and coordination with and among allied and friendly states to serve U.S. global interests.

3. Dealing more effectively with non-governmental forces affecting our international interests.

4. How to deal with the successor generations.

SUBJECT

The Political Context of the Williamsburg Summit—And a Look at its Political Agenda

U.S. Objectives at Williamsburg

Our fundamental objective is to have the Williamsburg Summit demonstrate to world public opinion a vigorous American President leading the West on the paths of recovery and unity. Agreement by the leaders to economic goals such as non-inflationary growth and a more open trading system will contribute to our fundamental objective—as well as being intrinsically desirable. So will agreement by the leaders to a common view of such issues as INF deployment and arms control negotiations, and the Middle East peace process.

The Political Context—General

Our Summit partners will go into the Williamsburg meetings with two main preoccupations, economic recovery and East-West relations.

All of the leaders will be deeply concerned about the prospects for their economies and for the impact economic developments will have on their own political futures.

The European Summit participants—along with other political leaders in Western Europe—have a second set of concerns, regarding the linked processes of INF deployment and arms control negotiations. Japan, which traditionally has been aloof from such matters, has paid increasing attention over the last six months, its attentions being aroused by the question of redeploying SS-20s east of the Urals. Japan has for the first time come to see its own security interests enmeshed in the INF process and is particularly anxious to avoid seeing those interests harmed as the price of a European settlement. And while Canada's direct involvement is less than that of the others, it shares the basic concern.

All the Summit participants have strongly supported our negotiating position in Geneva, including both the ultimate objective of reducing long-range land-based INF missiles to zero and our willingness to seek an interim agreement reducing warheads to equal U.S. and Soviet levels on a global basis. The UK, FRG, and Italy, the three European countries which will be basing U.S. missiles at the end of this year absent Soviet agreement to the zero option, remain firmly committed to deployments.

The INF issue's effect on the Summit is likely to be indirect, not direct. The hovering presence of the INF issue, with all the political strains it puts on European governments, will create a strong desire to avoid a public failure at the Summit which could damage intra-Alliance relations at a time when solidarity is most needed. While this could limit confrontation, some allies may seek to use our desire to avoid trouble as leverage regarding other issues. Kohl and Genscher provided evidence of this during their recent visit,² when they used INF as justification for movement in the CSCE and for downplaying East-West economic relations at the Summit.

² April 14–15.

The Europeans generally are anxious to improve the atmosphere in East-West political relations. They continue to ask about a Reagan-Andropov summit, in ways that indicate their desire for one. Kohl will be visiting Andropov before the summer break.³ More specifically, the Germans and the French in particular want to move forward in the CSCE. Whether we like it or not, the Germans do relate movement in this area to INF. They tend to think the Neutral and Non-aligned draft is basically satisfactory, though there can be improvements in regard to both human rights and CDE. Our problems with the NNA draft are far more profound: In light of Poland and Soviet internal repression, we need real progress on human rights. We can expect intense debate with the allies on CSCE in coming weeks, but the issue may not be settled between now and the Summit.

We believe European willingness to concentrate their Middle East activities and pronouncements on support of the President's peace initiative will fade progressively should success continue to elude us—which is what the Europeans foresee. If there is no tangible progress by late May, we must use Williamsburg to give our partners the fullest briefing of the state of play in the Middle East and draw on the sympathies and interests of each to gain their renewed endorsement of the President's September 1 initiative. Failure to take the initiative at Williamsburg, in the absence of progress either in Lebanon or in the peace process, will increase the likelihood of a Middle East pronouncement at the June 6–7 Stuttgart European Summit, which could openly mark a new division between us and the Europeans. This in turn could lead Japan to open the door wider to the PLO.

East-West economic relations, as you are aware, is a subject the others would prefer not to discuss in any detail at Williamsburg. If we not only insist on discussion, but try to use the Summit as a decision-making occasion, the result could be real trouble—perhaps a reenactment of Versailles. The management of this issue, unlike the Middle East, lies within the control of the U.S. and its Summit partners, and it is important that within the next few weeks we reach an agreement to achieve the necessary East-West economic understandings in the other Ministerial meetings of the spring. Kohl's agreement to cooperate with us in the efforts underway in NATO, the OECD/IEA and COCOM, on the understanding that we will not push East-West economic issues at the Summit, is a major step in the right direction.

A few weeks ago it appeared that US–EC agricultural disputes might reach a level of contentiousness that would adversely affect the Summit. Both sides have backed off, and while the dispute is not resolved, it seems unlikely to cause trouble at Williamsburg.

³ Kohl visited Moscow, July 4–6, and met with Andropov on July 6. (Serge Schmemmann, "Kohl's View of Soviet Talks: Blunt and Useful," New York Times, July 7, 1983, p. A8)

And the Particulars

While there is much that unites the other Summit participants, there are also significant differences between them in interests and attitudes. For example, Japan, Germany, and the U.K. all are experiencing at least a modest recovery, accompanied by relatively low inflation, and none of them would accept advice further to stimulate their economies. France, on the other hand, which has been forced to take unpopular deflationary measures, and which has chosen to explain France's economic plight as the product of outside forces, might well press for worldwide stimulus.

In most cases, the Summiters will want very much to have a successful Summit—i.e. one that seems to address the issue of economic recovery, and does so in a unified, not contentions, manner. While their specific approaches differ, they add up to this result:

Two leaders—Thatcher and Nakasone—attend the Summit at a critical moment in their own political careers. Mrs. Thatcher may decide for elections either in June or in the Autumn; in either case she would want the Summit to show her off as a statesmanlike figure; and while economic indicators are up in Britain, it would also be useful to her to have some sort of multilateral blessing for her economic programs. Nakasone is also weighing a decision whether to dissolve the Diet and call general elections in June, or to wait until the results of the Tanaka-Lockheed trial are in.⁴ He is likely to be a more active Summit participant than his predecessors with a view to strengthening his political position by projecting himself as a world statesman.

Canada and Italy have a continuing institutional stake in the Summit. It is the one setting in which they are seen as part of the club of major countries. As a consequence, both are primarily interested in a "successful" Summit which would ensure that the mechanism itself will not be called into question. For Italy, this consideration will override a policy interest in pushing for things we would not want to agree to, like massive currency intervention. Trudeau seems to have learned at last from his long experience in office that Canada's economic fate is inextricably linked to the U.S., and that there's little room for him to take independent lines.

⁴ On July 27, 1976, former Japanese Prime Minister Tanaka was arrested for taking more than $1 million dollars in funds from the Lockheed Corporation. For additional information, see Foreign Relations, 1969–1976, vol. E–12, Documents on East and Southeast Asia, 1973–1976, Document 227.

Kohl puts great stock in the German-American relationship, but is at least as concerned about relations with France, as well as about developments within France. The worst sort of Summit for him would be one where he had to choose sides between the U.S. and France. Kohl made this very clear during his recent visit. German efforts to persuade us to downplay East-West economic issues at Williamsburg reflect both this concern and their own doubts regarding our proposals. On the other hand, Kohl's keen desire for a successful Summit and for avoidance of a U.S.-French clash can be useful: He may be able to play a role as go-between between us and the French.

That leaves France, the only country that might consciously risk jeopardizing the success of the Summit. We have no information that this is the French intention, nor do we think it is. On the other hand, the French Government is in difficult economic straits, and has already reacted by scapegoating other countries, including the U.S. Furthermore, in France, more than any other Summit country, a prickly, ego-centric nationalism seems to have political payoff.

The French could act up if they don't get some sort of trophy to display in terms of economic policy. Mitterrand badly needs some sign either of international endorsement of his policies, or of success in getting others to do things that might help France. The French might also react explosively to an attempt to rope them in on East-West economic policies they don't want. Aside from the straightforward French commercial interest in doing as much business with the East as possible, there would be two political motivations: 1) the long-standing French refusal to allow policies (except in obvious security matters) to be determined multilaterally; and 2) the probable French desire, having taken a step against the USSR with the expulsion of Soviet spies, not to take any new, significant actions against the USSR and even to balance this action to demonstrate French "independence" vis-a-vis the U.S.

France's attitude is the key to a successful Summit and we should think of ways to make that attitude as sweet as possible. Two suggestions from a longer list:

—We have doubts that more frequent currency intervention by the United States would have any significant impact—either on exchange rates (except on a very short term basis) or on the French economy. On the other hand, some U.S. movement on this issue would appeal greatly to the French—it would be proclaimed as a French victory. Other gestures in the monetary area, such as a franc support loan, might also have a political payoff.

—We doubt if there is much give to the French position against taking East-West economic decisions at Williamsburg, but it is possible that we can persuade the French to go along with much of what we want in the OECD, COCOM and NATO if we agree to downplay these issues at Williamsburg. It is essential to try to work out an agreement to that effect with the French; given the German interest in avoiding a U.S.-French dispute, the Germans just possibly can help in this process since Kohl agreed to this trade-off.

Political Agenda

The central political discussion should be on East-West security issues, in particular the interlinked questions of INF deployment and arms control. This should be a good time for such discussion. It should also be a uniquely good group in which to have the discussion since the Japanese will be included.

Thus, there would be considerable value in an exchange of views which produced an endorsement by all the Summit allies of our negotiating efforts, as well as recognition by the Europeans and Japan of their common interests in this area. We should aim at recording such a consensus in the basic or a separate post-summit statement that (1) would express agreement that implementation of the NATO dual-track approach is important to the security of all the Williamsburg participants; (2) endorse the U.S. negotiating effort; and (3) affirm that deployments will go forward as scheduled in the three basing countries represented at the meeting, the UK, FRG, and Italy.

This will also be a very useful time for a discussion of the Soviet Union under Andropov and prospects for East-West relations. The process of reducing the differences between us in our attitudes toward the Soviet Union has to include sharing assessments at this high level. In such a discussion Kohl and others may well press for a Reagan-Andropov summit. As noted, CSCE will also come up, and we should argue vigorously for an approach that demands progress on human rights beyond the Helsinki level.

Some political subjects have substantial downside risks. While a discussion of Central America may be inevitable, if the French are in a mood to pick fights, this is one that could touch them off. We should be prepared to argue our case should the others do so.

Poland also poses risks. Unless we have resolved these issues beforehand, a discussion of Poland could be the occasion for the others to gang up on the United States regarding rescheduling, and possibly other actions aimed at normalizing relations with Poland. We might be able to stall by suggesting that a reassessment of policy should wait until after the Pope's June 16-22 visit to Poland, but given the buildup of pressures, particularly on rescheduling, this may not work.

Finally, as suggested above, the Middle East is a potentially divisive subject. How the discussion will go depends upon progress on the Middle East peace initiative between now and the Summit. If progress is not made, there may be challenging questions at Williamsburg followed by open dissent at Stuttgart. But this is a subject that cannot be avoided, and indeed it should not be: we should seek to line the others up, once again, behind the President's September 1 initiative.

My suggestion is to try to ensure that the political discussion dwells as much as possible on the central issues of arms control and relations with the Soviet Union. Subjects like the Middle East and Central America should be carefully handled. Precisely how to calibrate the approach to the political agenda, taking into account the different levels of discussion (heads of government, foreign ministers, political directors), merits further consideration, and I would welcome an opportunity to discuss the subject with you and Larry.

150. Address by the Assistant Secretary of State for European Affairs (Burt)¹

Hamburg, April 25, 1983

A Critical Juncture for the Atlantic Alliance

This conference could not be more timely. And the need to view trans-Atlantic developments with care could not be more critical. As a former journalist, I am aware that those outside government have the opportunity to observe the ebb and flow of current affairs with a unique perspective. As a government official, I am also aware that this opportunity is not always seized as often as it might be. It is for this reason that TIME and the conference organizers deserve our most sincere thanks and appreciation. Indeed, those of us enmeshed in the day-to-day of policymaking are in need of the criticism and vision of people such as yourselves and gatherings such as this. Without the benefit of perspective, we are less likely to shape historical forces than to be shaped by them.

I believe we have arrived at a critical juncture in the annals of the Atlantic alliance. Let me hasten to add that this is not because we are in a deep crisis as some would have us believe. Rather, we are in the midst of what can best be described as a grand debate. It is a debate over the very essence of the Atlantic alliance—its purpose, its shape, its future.

This is hardly the first time the alliance has been in the throes of self-examination and self-criticism. Indeed, the Atlantic alliance was born amidst controversy. The entire notion of peacetime engagement in the affairs of Europe went against the grain of American history. Postwar America was anxious to bring its boys back home and bring about a parochial peace with prosperity.

Nor were the formative years of the alliance easy ones for Europeans. Reconstruction and recovery were foremost in everyone's mind. Arming to prevent yet another war demanded all too scarce resources; forging bonds of trust with recent foes demanded the intellectual courage to look ahead rather than back.

But on both sides of the ocean, the uncommon men of the immediate postwar era made difficult, and sometimes unpopular, decisions. In the United States, two world wars had shown all too clearly the folly of isolationism. It was understood that Jefferson's famous injunction against "entangling alliances" did not have permanent application. In Europe it was understood that the security of the Continent against the emerging Soviet threat required permanent association with a noncontinental power. Out of these twin recognitions the alliance came to life. The initial debate had been decided.

The alliance of the 1950s was an alliance overwhelmingly dominated by the United States. Deterrence depended on U.S. nuclear superiority to offset a Red Army which never demobilized. Decisions were largely reached in Washington and communicated through NATO in Paris. For the most part, we spoke, Europe listened; we led, Europe followed.

By the 1960s it was increasingly evident that such a formula had grown obsolete. Europe was no longer prostrate. Economic recovery had succeeded. The alliance was no longer based on a simple security guarantee but had evolved into a true military coalition with integrated national forces. And Europeans were less and less willing to accept American leadership without question. The conditions for a second great debate had materialized.

Many of the strains accompanying these developments were manifested in the nuclear realm. Then, as today, nuclear politics went to the heart of the alliance. Two principal issues emerged in the nuclear debate of the 1960s. The problem was in part military. The American guarantee was no longer as convincing, given Soviet strides in developing their nuclear arsenal. How could the U.S. strategic deterrent compensate for conventional weakness and deter Soviet strategic forces simultaneously? Equally, the problem was political. Europeans wanted some say in the life-and-death decisions affecting nuclear weapons.

Washington's proposed approach for dealing with these problems—the NATO multilateral nuclear force—only exacerbated these tensions. Fortunately, the ultimate solution had the opposite effect. The doctrine of flexible response, formally adopted by the alliance in 1967,² provided for a continuum of forces—conventional, theater nuclear, and strategic nuclear—by which deterrence could be maintained at all levels. And a new institution, the NATO Nuclear Planning Group, was created.³ Responsibility for nuclear policymaking would henceforth be shared. The basic Atlantic bond was maintained.

Evolution of the Current Debate

But in the best tradition of Hegelian logic, yesterday's synthesis has given way to today's antithesis. There is no little irony in this. In the 1960s, European concerns reflected a perceived lack of U.S. commitment to maintain the American nuclear guarantee; in the 1980s, the most vocal elements in Europe view with alarm American efforts to ensure the credibility of this same nuclear guarantee.

Thus, in 1983, we are once more hearing from many quarters that the alliance is no longer relevant, or viable, or both; that only radical surgery can prolong the patient's life. If I read the signs correctly, a third grand debate is underway. The reasons for this happening now are several.

First, the passage of time has dulled the initial Atlantic impulse; the alliance no longer seems as relevant to the concerns of young people bearing outlooks formed by experiences far from those of the post-war era.

Second, European states and institutions have advanced in capacity, wealth, and independence. Many on both sides of the Atlantic view the alliance as an anachronism, a product of an era of American strength and European weakness which no longer exists.

Third, U.S. and European interests are not always identical or even complementary. We are often economic competitors. We often have differing views of Third World or regional crises. We at times have contrasting assessments of the Soviet Union, the threat it poses, and how best to manage East-West relations.

Fourth, a prolonged period of economic recession has increased competition for budgetary allocations. Providing more for defense and deciding how much each member of the alliance ought to provide are increasingly contentious.

Finally, shifts in the military balance and the emergence of U.S.-Soviet strategic parity, in particular, have raised anew the issue of American reliability. The credibility of the U.S. strategic deterrent is sometimes doubted. The emergence of Soviet superiority at the intermediate nuclear level has raised new questions as to the coupling of the defense of Europe and the U.S. strategic deterrent.

That a great debate over the future of the Atlantic alliance should evolve out of such circumstances is hardly odd; indeed, it would be odd if one were not to take place. Not surprisingly, we are seeing challenges to the basic Atlantic model coming from all parts of the political spectrum. Both sides of the Atlantic are participating. What I should like to do today is make my modest contribution to this debate.

American Challenges to the Atlantic Model

In the United States, it is significant that we are not witnessing a revival of traditional isolationism. Fortress America is not being promoted as a model of American well-being. Perhaps the notion is simply too discredited to hold much attraction; perhaps most have simply come to accept that the United States is too dependent upon, and interdependent with, the rest of the world to pursue this simplistic and dangerous option.

Other challenges to the Atlantic connection exist, however. There is, for example, an American school of thought that has come to be known as "global unilateralism." Adherents of this school begin with an appreciation of the global scope of U.S. interests. They note the broad range of possible threats to the United States. And they would reduce the U.S. commitment to Europe so that we could enhance our flexibility to act everywhere.

This approach is flawed. All interests are not vital; all are not equal. The balance of power in Europe is central to world stability and American involvement in Europe is central to the balance there. Moreover, our range of ties, commercial and cultural, cannot be duplicated or done without. The reality is that there is no cheap way of protecting these interests. Deterrence, to be credible, requires a large U.S. continental commitment; it also requires that we act together as a true coalition.

A second challenge is perhaps better known to you. For want of a better phrase, I call it "Atlantic reconstruction." It manifests itself in several places—the Congress and the media most notably—and in several ways by, for example, threatening troop withdrawals or not funding defense programs critical to the defense of Europe.

The roots of this American movement are to be found in the soil of frustration and resentment. There is a growing belief in the United States that Europeans are not doing their share, be it to defend themselves or to defend common interests around the world. Sometimes tied to this view is the belief that Europe's commitment to detente outweighs its commitment to the alliance, that Europe is more concerned with its economic well-being than with Western defense. The reconstructionists want to end this alleged “free ride.” They wish to send a signal to Europe to stimulate a larger European defense effort.

As is often the case, neither analysis nor prescription is accurate. That we all need to do more to strengthen deterrence is obvious. And that there is a requirement for equity on defense efforts in a coalition of democratic states is also clear. More must be done, and the Reagan Administration has worked hard to increase defense spending on both sides of the Atlantic. At the same time, we have sought to deflate misconceptions about allied contributions to the common defense. There is not enough awareness, for example, that should conflict arise in Europe, 90% of NATO’s land forces and 75% of its sea and air forces would be European.

There are those who argue that we could improve the situation by cutting U.S. efforts. I do not doubt that by doing less in Europe the United States would, indeed, “send a signal.” Unfortunately, it would be the wrong signal with the wrong result. In the name of enhancing deterrence and defense, those who would cut back America’s contribution could well achieve precisely the opposite. Reducing U.S. strength and raising questions about the U.S. commitment are hardly self-evident ways of promoting peace and stability.

European Alternatives

An even greater debate is taking place on this side of the Atlantic. This is to be expected, given the immediacy of the issues here. Let me address briefly what I see as the principal alternatives being presented.

Neutrality. Three schools of thought appear to dominate. The first would exchange the alliance for neutralism. Some go as far as to see this neutralism embracing all of Europe, West and East. It is argued that a Europe without allegiance to either bloc and without significant military forces would be a safer haven, less likely to be drawn into a confrontation between the two superpowers. Somewhat differently, it is asserted that Europe (and especially Germany) could make its most important contribution to peace by serving as a bridge between the two superpowers, explaining one to the other.

These are romantic visions. With or without its Eastern neighbors, a weak and neutral Western Europe would be under the sway of the strongest continental power, the Soviet Union. What is needed for peace is less a bridge than a bulwark. Our problems with the U.S.S.R. are not caused by a lack of communication, although communication is important. Our problems with the U.S.S.R are caused by a lack of Soviet restraint and respect for the interests and well-being of others.

Armed Independence. Some recognize these realities and, instead, argue for a Western Europe that is strong, independent of the United States, and able to provide fully for its own security. An image of a European military entity is held up, the analogue to European political cooperation and economic integration. In this model, Europe would thus be able to mediate between the two powers from a position of strength—able to deter one without being tied to the other. European interests would prosper, we are told.

I can do no better in describing this school of thought than by quoting Hedley Bull of Oxford University:

The course that the Western European countries should now be exploring may be called the Europeanist one. It requires the countries of Western Europe to combine more closely together, increase their defense efforts, and take steps toward reducing their military dependence on America.

Professor Bull's vision, too, suffers from a lack of realism. Europe at present lacks the requisite political basis for constituting such collective management of its security. It is not clear that European states would be willing to make the necessary political commitments and economic investment. And it is not at all certain that the emergence of an independent, armed Europe—with conventional and nuclear forces alike—could occur without crisis or even conflict. Indeed, the security and stability we all know and enjoy now could be jeopardized by such development.

Reconstruction. A third approach is embodied by proposals now coming from opposition parties in northern Europe. In many respects, these ideas are the mirror image of the proposals offered by American reconstructionists. The European reconstructionists have several goals: to lessen the influence of the United States; to reduce the likelihood of nuclear war in Europe; to carry out a more independent policy toward Moscow; and to promote European interests around the world as they see fit. They seek not to leave the alliance so much as to change it from within.

Even such "reformist" policies are not without major difficulties; indeed, they draw upon several of the worst features of the two alternatives just discussed. We should not delude ourselves. Conventional defense needs strengthening. But more robust conventional defense efforts will not make nuclear forces irrelevant or redundant. Soviet conventional and nuclear advantages must be offset, whether by deployments, arms reductions, or both. The bond between forces in Europe and U.S. strategic deterrence, or coupling, must be maintained. At the same time, conventional force improvements will prove costly; a consensus for a major increase in the level of defense effort has yet to emerge. And heightened European independence from the United States has its risks; Europeans cannot choose when they wish to enjoy the fruits of alliance and when they do not. There is room for disagreement and difference within the alliance but not for selective commitment.

Other Concepts

Neutralism, armed independence, reconstruction—these are the three basic European alternatives to the current Atlanticist framework for Western security. Cutting across these approaches are various themes which would also alter the current Atlantic bridge in a decisive manner.

Antinuclearism is one such idea. The aim is to reduce or, if possible, eliminate the presence of nuclear weapons in Europe and with them the risk of nuclear war. The most ardent enthusiasts of this proposition would do so unilaterally in hopes of eliciting parallel Soviet restraint.

But I agree with [former Secretary of Defense] Harold Brown's observation about U.S.-Soviet arms competition: "When we build, the Soviet Union builds; and when we don't build, the Soviet Union still builds." Moreover, unilateral actions by the West would undermine our best chance for meaningful arms control negotiations. More seriously, unilateral nuclear disarmament would threaten deterrence and heighten the vulnerability of the West, too.

Nor can there be a policy of "no first use" of nuclear weapons. The effect would once again be decoupling and thus erode, not enhance, deterrence. It is the prospect of the use of nuclear weapons and the full weight of American might which helps to keep the peace in Europe.

Wishing away the possibility that nuclear weapons will be used is not enough. Declarations are simply words. Meanwhile, Soviet conventional, chemical, and nuclear capabilities are real and increasing. Were the alliance to adopt a policy of no first use of nuclear weapons, the danger of conventional war—which would be incredibly destructive in our age—would be increased and with it the possibility of nuclear tragedy. More than 50 million people perished in World War II; we cannot adopt policies which would heighten the risk of conventional, not to mention nuclear, war in Europe.

Lastly, there are those who remain within the alliance or Atlantic house but who place all their hopes on arms control. Arms control—whether some version of a nuclear freeze or negotiations more broadly—is held up as the panacea for Europe's dilemma. Only arms control, it is alleged, offers the means to limit the threat, reduce the levels of weapons and the spending on them, and promote renewed detente.

But such hopes cannot live in isolation. Arms control will only prosper if the Soviet Union has incentive to negotiate; what is required to bring this about is a sound military foundation on our part. Nor can arms control be expected to persuade the Soviet leadership to eschew the role of force; Soviet policy at home and abroad depends on it too much. Arms control has the potential to buttress our security and deterrence; it cannot take the place of our collective efforts to do the same.

What Is at Stake

In more normal times, debates involving competing conceptions of alliance security would be welcomed. Over years or even decades, we would perhaps create a new consensus. But 1983 is not a normal time. To the contrary, 1983 could well turn out to be the most important year in the history of the Atlantic alliance since its inception.

The reason for so stating is clear. To a degree unlike any other year since 1949, the determination and credibility of the alliance are being tested. How we implement the December 1979 decision on intermediate nuclear forces will have a major impact on our future. Those who would apply their abstract or idealized notions of how best to structure the Atlantic relationship to determine the outcome of the INF [intermediate-range nuclear forces] debate should only do so with a full understanding of what is at stake.

Not surprisingly, this temptation exists. There are those in the United States who wonder why we should go to such lengths to bring about the implementation of the decision. They are unhappy that so many facets of the U.S.-European relationship are held hostage to the INF decision and cite the possibility that deployment of U.S. missiles in Europe could heighten the risk of a direct Soviet nuclear attack on the American homeland.

On this side of the Atlantic, there are those—particularly the new neutralists—who maintain precisely the opposite. They argue that new U.S. weapons based on the Continent would enable us to localize or limit an East-West nuclear exchange to Europe. Others simply argue that the new missiles are not necessary because the Soviet Union has no intention of exploiting its current INF monopoly. Or, in yet another variation, there are those who are prepared to wait indefinitely for arms control to solve the security problem created by SS-20 deployment. In every case, they seek to opt out of implementing the 1979 decision.

The fallacies in each of these approaches are manifest. The United States cannot be secure for long in a world in which Western Europe is not. Americans who would weaken or remove the U.S. nuclear guarantee would jeopardize the prospects for stability and peace everywhere. In the name of reducing risk to themselves, they will have raised it for everyone.

European opponents of deployment are also mistaken. The effect of new U.S. missiles would not be to limit or localize a nuclear exchange in Europe but rather to prevent one. Indeed, it is in part through the threat of escalation and full American involvement that we help to promote stability and deterrence in Europe. Indeed, no better proof for this proposition exists than Defense Minister Ustinov's recent comment that the Soviet Union would respond to a strike by U.S. systems in Europe by directly attacking the United States. If that's not coupling, I don't know what is.

Those who maintain no new deployments are needed, whether owing to Soviet good will or the prospects of arms control, are simply deluding themselves. It is probably true that Western Europe could live with a Soviet preponderance of force; but to expect the Soviets not to exploit any advantage for its own paranoid, political purposes is to ignore every lesson of history. Similarly, the U.S.S.R. cannot be expected to negotiate seriously in the absence of any incentive to do so; deployment, either in promise or in fact, remains our best and only way to get the Soviets to come to the negotiating table in good faith.

In short, the implementation of the INF double-track decision has become the touchstone for Western security in the 1980s. The decision continues to have a sound political and a sound military rationale. It was taken in response to an unprovoked Soviet buildup which continues unabated. It represents continued alliance commitment to a concept of deterrence predicated on the notion that American power tied to Europe is the best way of promoting European stability and peace. The commitment of the Reagan Administration and allied governments to pursuing both tracks—arms control and, if need be, deployment—of the 1979 decision is now unshakeable.

My support for decisions taken some 3½ years ago and my criticism of various alternative visions of the alliance should not be interpreted as complacency. The flaws of the various alternatives I have described should not be taken as a complete dismissal of their validity. Nor should it be understood as a complete endorsement of the status quo. If I may modify an old American adage for my purposes here tonight, I would simply advise against fixing the alliance more than it is broken. Or, to shift metaphors, I would simply urge you to beware of cures worse than the disease.

This is not a call for standing pat. Reform is needed. So too is close consultation. We must upgrade not only our nuclear deterrent but also our conventional forces. More must be done to safeguard common interests outside the formal treaty area. We must ensure that our commercial relations with the East are consistent with our political and security requirements. And we must continue to be imaginative and flexible in our search for meaningful arms control agreements.

We must be careful, though, in how we proceed. Europe in the 30 years since the Second World War has been spared armed conflict. We have achieved levels of prosperity and freedom without historical precedent. Too much is at stake to go ahead precipitously or recklessly. The alliance and the basic Atlantic model or structure remain relevant and viable. Only within its contours can we harness the resources of the West in a manner which maximizes effectiveness and minimizes the burden on our free societies and strained economies.

There is a wonderful line from the novel, The Leopard, by the Italian author Giuseppe di Lampedusa. "If we want things to stay as they are, things will have to change." To a degree this is true. Indeed, the history of the alliance is a series of adaptations to evolving circumstances. The alliance of 1983 is not the alliance of 1949.

Yet, there must also be limits to our departures. The essentials of the Atlantic model that is the alliance have served us well and should be saved. The alliance can continue to safeguard our interests if we are as wise about what to keep as we are about what to change.

151. Editorial Note

On April 27, 1983, at 6 p.m., senior Ronald Reagan administration officials took part in a background briefing to the press in the White House Briefing Room in advance of President Ronald Reagan's address before a joint session of Congress later that evening. Assistant White House Press Secretary Lyndon Allin began the briefing by noting that it would be attributable to only senior administration officials and would be embargoed until Reagan gave his speech. Then one of the two senior officials spoke: "SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL: Hello. I will be brief, and take your questions in about five minutes together with my colleague.

"The President has decided to request the extraordinary measure of a joint session of Congress to address the Congress and the American people tonight on an issue that is of extreme importance to this country and its relationship to Central America and to our national security.

"He believes that the challenge is so important that it requires the development of a very broad, national consensus and strong bipartisan support for the support of U.S. policy. He will go into the nature of the challenge as he sees it. And that is that there is, today, a Soviet and Cuban inspired and supported campaign of subversion in Central America that is very well advanced.

"The President will take the format, in his remarks tonight, of explaining just what U.S. interests are or, in other words, why we should care. What is it about the area that affects our interests—security interests? In this context, he will talk about the level of trade, the level of petroleum that passes through this area—almost half the trade, half of our petroleum requirements.

“He will talk about the geo-strategic locations in the area—the canal and so forth. He will talk about the level of Soviet advisors and Cuban advisors, which outnumber the American advisory program by many, many, many fold.

“SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL: Fifty to one.

“SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL: Fifty to one, my colleague tells me.

“He will, basically, explain the character of the problem as it exists and the conditions within these countries. That is that conditions of recession in terms of trade on primary products have led to very high unemployment, high inflation, which makes attractive an appealingly simply concept of Marxism. And this has been very much exploited by the Soviet Union and Cuba and which has fostered and supported insurgencies which are far along in El Salvador.

“In the nature of the solution to the problem, the President will make very clear that the solution is not and cannot be a military one, that the long-term solution must be built upon the economic development of the area and a long process of establishing sustainable growth in these countries, that in a political context the long-term future must rely in greater progress toward pluralism, toward reform of institutions, establishment of democratic institutions, and greater protection for human freedoms in these countries.

“But in order for this long-term political and economic program to have any hope of succeeding, there must be a fundamental level of security behind which this development process can take place. The President’s sense of priorities is already expressed in the amount of investment that is going into these relative categories today—roughly three to one in favor of economic assistance versus security assistance. But there must be this security assistance.

“The President will lay out his four policy pillars, if you will: our political objectives, our economic objectives and policies, our security objectives and policies and, finally, our objectives for regional cooperation and our support for regional solutions to regional problems.

“He will, also, provide certain assurances as to the U.S. conduct in seeking these objectives and limits which we impose on ourselves. He will stress that the United States has not sent troops and there is no need for U.S. troops in the area, nor have any been requested.

“He will make a very strong call for bipartisanship. He will make clear he views this as a shared responsibility and one which we all must shoulder.

"I'll call in just a moment on my colleague for a little more precise definition of the four posts and the four assurances. I wanted to say, fundamentally, that it's very clear to the President—and this goes to his motives for the speech—that we have had problems in getting the levels of assistance—economic as well as security—that are needed to sustain U.S. policy in the area. He believes that the reason we've had problems is because there is not an adequate understanding of the problem, nor an adequate understanding of how we're trying to solve it, either in the Congress or in the country at large.

"On the other two occasions when the President has spoken publicly about this issue, it hasn't reached a television audience, it hasn't been carried. And so today he hopes to reach the people of the United States as well as the Congress because he is—accepts that there is no promise of long-term success in sustaining this policy unless it is widely understood by Americans. But he believes that if he identifies what our interests are, why we should care, how they are threatened, and what we intend to do about it, that we can reverse current trends before a crisis point is reached.

"The close of the speech—the President will also announce that he intends to nominate an ambassador at large to the Central American region. He goes on to say that he or she will have as his or her duties: Lending U.S. support to regional efforts by the governments of the area to find solutions to their problems and to bring peace to the area; and separately, but related, to work closely with the U.S. Congress to be attentive to their interests and concerns and to assure the closest possible coordination of U.S. policy in the area with them.

"Anything to add?

"SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL: I can be very brief. Thank you.

"I think the essence of the strategy is in the four points with our values, support for democracy, political change, and for human rights at the very start. The President does contrast the evolution in Nicaragua and the evolution in El Salvador, in the one case, from a very broad consensus type movement in Nicaragua towards a monopoly of power, militarization, and foreign intervention; and in the other case, an opposition movement from a situation of serious human rights violations towards the construction of democratic institutions, a limiting of human rights abuses, and very substantial land reform.

"The second principle is, of course, economic support—both economic assistance in the near term and the Caribbean Basin Initiative to give hope for the future.

"The third point is military assistance as a shield. The President very clearly states that this limited program is designed to give the—our friends the opportunity to hold off and, indeed, take the initiative against the insurgents, pending the rest of his strategy taking hold.

“And, finally, on the diplomatic front, the President does state very clearly that he will support any agreement—he uses the word ‘any agreements’—reached among the Central American countries to remove all foreign military advisers and trainers, to limit the import of offensive weapons, to permit access to opposition groups to democratic processes in elections in each country; and, finally, on a basis of verification and reciprocity, to end the support for insurgencies from one country to another.

“He states his Nicaragua policy very clearly. He says that the United States does not seek to overthrow the Nicaraguan government. It does seek to—in accord with the United States and international law—to see that flows of armaments to neighboring countries are limited and eliminated.

“He indicates that the United States cannot and should not protect the Nicaraguan government against its own people. But we should offer a diplomatic alternative and that is what is contained in the four assurances that he very strongly proposes.

“SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL: Just a word or two: in numerous places in the speech and in the substance of the President’s speech, the theme of bipartisanship is very evident.

“It isn’t only that the President is asking for bipartisan teamwork and support, it is also that he is formulating the administration’s Central American policies in four points plus four assurances, of which three of the four are clearly the kinds of things that have specifically and generally been asked and requested by both sides of the aisle by the Congress.

“And I think that the administration is grateful to see and appreciative in seeing the emergence of some substantial bipartisanship particularly in the last week in the situation in which Chairman Long and his Subcommittee of Appropriations in the House has approved, with a bipartisan vote, the reprogramming of $30 million of the military assistance requested by the administration, with the suggestion that more can be forthcoming with more progress.

“Let me make one final point, and that was that the President ends by seeking four specific things from the Congress, and he asks for the prompt action of the Congress on reprogramming 1983 funds for both economic and security assistance; prompt action on the 1983 supplemental; prompt action on the 1984 bill; and finally, immediate action to move the CBI tax and trade legislation to the floor.

“He notes, with his appreciation, the introduction today in the House of Representatives by Chairman Rostenkowski, of the CBI legislation. As a footnote, he mentions—in terms of overall levels—that in 1984 our aggregate request is for about $600 million to the whole area. That’s about 10 percent of what Americans will spend this year on coin-operated video games.” (Reagan Library, WHORM: Subject File, Speeches, SP 283–22 Central America (In Person) [Address Before a Joint Session of Congress] 04/27/1983)

152. Address by President Reagan Before a Joint Session of Congress¹

Washington, April 27, 1983

Address Before a Joint Session of the Congress on Central America

Mr. Speaker, Mr. President, distinguished Members of the Congress, honored guests, and my fellow Americans:

A number of times in past years, Members of Congress and a President have come together in meetings like this to resolve a crisis. I have asked for this meeting in the hope that we can prevent one.

It would be hard to find many Americans who aren’t aware of our stake in the Middle East, the Persian Gulf, or the NATO line dividing the free world from the Communist bloc. And the same could be said for Asia.

But in spite of, or maybe because of, a flurry of stories about places like Nicaragua and El Salvador and, yes, some concerted propaganda, many of us find it hard to believe we have a stake in problems involving those countries. Too many have thought of Central America as just that place way down below Mexico that can't possibly constitute a threat to our well-being. And that's why I've asked for this session. Central America's problems do directly affect the security and the well-being of our own people. And Central America is much closer to the United States than many of the world troublespots that concern us. So, we work to restore our own economy; we cannot afford to lose sight of our neighbors to the south.

El Salvador is nearer to Texas than Texas is to Massachusetts. Nicaragua is just as close to Miami, San Antonio, San Diego, and Tucson as those cities are to Washington, where we're gathered tonight.

But nearness on the map doesn't even begin to tell the strategic importance of Central America, bordering as it does on the Caribbean—our lifeline to the outside world. Two-thirds of all our foreign trade and petroleum pass through the Panama Canal and the Caribbean. In a European crisis at least half of our supplies for NATO would go through these areas by sea. It's well to remember that in early 1942, a handful of Hitler's submarines sank more tonnage there than in all of the Atlantic Ocean. And they did this without a single naval base anywhere in the area. And today, the situation is different. Cuba is host to a Soviet combat brigade, a submarine base capable of servicing Soviet submarines, and military air bases visited regularly by Soviet military aircraft.

Because of its importance, the Caribbean Basin is a magnet for adventurism. We're all aware of the Libyan cargo planes refueling in Brazil a few days ago on their way to deliver "medical supplies" to Nicaragua. Brazilian authorities discovered the so-called medical supplies were actually munitions and prevented their delivery.

You may remember that last month, speaking on national television, I showed an aerial photo of an airfield being built on the island of Grenada.² Well, if that airfield had been completed, those planes could have refueled there and completed their journey.

If the Nazis during World War II and the Soviets today could recognize the Caribbean and Central America as vital to our interests, shouldn't we, also? For several years now, under two administrations, the United States has been increasing its defense of freedom in the Caribbean Basin. And I can tell you tonight, democracy is beginning to take root in El Salvador, which until a short time ago, knew only dictatorship.

The new government is now delivering on its promises of democracy, reforms, and free elections. It wasn't easy, and there was resistance to many of the attempted reforms, with assassinations of some of the reformers. Guerrilla bands and urban terrorists were portrayed in a worldwide propaganda campaign as freedom fighters, representative of the people. Ten days before I came into office, the guerrillas launched what they called "a final offensive" to overthrow the government. And their radio boasted that our new administration would be too late to prevent their victory.

Well, they learned that democracy cannot be so easily defeated. President Carter did not hesitate. He authorized arms and munitions to El Salvador. The guerrilla offensive failed, but not America's will. Every President since this country assumed global responsibilities has known that those responsibilities could only be met if we pursued a bipartisan foreign policy.

As I said a moment ago, the Government of El Salvador has been keeping its promises, like the land reform program which is making thousands of farm tenants, farm owners. In a little over 3 years, 20 percent of the arable land in El Salvador has been redistributed to more than 450,000 people. That's one in ten Salvadorans who have benefited directly from this program.

El Salvador has continued to strive toward an orderly and democratic society. The government promised free elections. On March 28th, a little more than a year ago, after months of campaigning by a variety of candidates, the suffering people of El Salvador were offered a chance to vote, to choose the kind of government they wanted. And suddenly, the so-called freedom fighters in the hills were exposed for what they really are—a small minority who want power for themselves and their backers, not democracy for the people. The guerrillas threatened death to anyone who voted. They destroyed hundreds of buses and trucks to keep the people from getting to the polling places. Their slogan was brutal: "Vote today, die tonight." But on election day, an unprecedented 80 percent of the electorate braved ambush and gunfire and trudged for miles, many of them, to vote for freedom. Now, that's truly fighting for freedom. We can never turn our backs on that.

Members of this Congress who went there as observers³ told me of a woman who was wounded by rifle fire on the way to the polls, who refused to leave the line to have her wound treated until after she had voted. Another woman had been told by the guerrillas that she would be killed when she returned from the polls, and she told the guerrillas, "You can kill me, you can kill my family, you can kill my neighbors. You can't kill us all." The real freedom fighters of El Salvador turned out to be the people of that country—the young, the old, the in-between—more than a million of them out of a population of less than 5 million. The world should respect this courage and not allow it to be belittled or forgotten. And again I say, in good conscience, we can never turn our backs on that.

The democratic political parties and factions in El Salvador are coming together around the common goal of seeking a political solution to their country's problems. New national elections will be held this year, and they will be open to all political parties. The government has invited the guerrillas to participate in the election and is preparing an amnesty law. The people of El Salvador are earning their freedom, and they deserve our moral and material support to protect it.

Yes, there are still major problems regarding human rights, the criminal justice system, and violence against noncombatants. And, like the rest of Central America, El Salvador also faces severe economic problems. But in addition to recession-depressed prices for major agricultural exports, El Salvador's economy is being deliberately sabotaged.

Tonight in El Salvador—because of ruthless guerrilla attacks—much of the fertile land cannot be cultivated; less than half the rolling stock of the railways remains operational; bridges, water facilities, telephone and electric systems have been destroyed and damaged. In one 22-month period, there were 5,000 interruptions of electrical power. One region was without electricity for a third of the year.

I think Secretary of State Shultz put it very well the other day: "Unable to win the free loyalty of El Salvador's people, the guerrillas," he said, "are deliberately and systematically depriving them of food, water, transportation, light, sanitation, and jobs. And these are the people who claim they want to help the common people."⁴ They don't want elections because they know they'd be defeated. But, as the previous election showed, the Salvadoran people's desire for democracy will not be defeated.

The guerrillas are not embattled peasants, armed with muskets. They're professionals, sometimes with better training and weaponry than the government's soldiers. The Salvadoran battalions that have received U.S. training have been conducting themselves well on the battlefield and with the civilian population. But so far, we've only provided enough money to train one Salvadoran soldier out of ten, fewer than the number of guerrillas that are trained by Nicaragua and Cuba.

And let me set the record straight on Nicaragua, a country next to El Salvador. In 1979 when the new government took over in Nicaragua, after a revolution which overthrew the authoritarian rule of Somoza, everyone hoped for the growth of democracy. We in the United States did, too. By January of 1981, our emergency relief and recovery aid to ⁴Shultz spoke on the "Struggle of Democracy in Central America" before the World Affairs Council and Chamber of Commerce in Dallas on April 15. His address is printed in Department of State Bulletin, May 1983, pp. 10–13.

Nicaragua totalled $118 million—more than provided by any other developed country. In fact, in the first 2 years of Sandinista rule, the United States directly or indirectly sent five times more aid to Nicaragua than it had in the 2 years prior to the revolution. Can anyone doubt the generosity and the good faith of the American people?

These were hardly the actions of a nation implacably hostile to Nicaragua. Yet, the Government of Nicaragua has treated us as an enemy. It has rejected our repeated peace efforts. It has broken its promises to us, to the Organization of American States and, most important of all, to the people of Nicaragua.

No sooner was victory achieved than a small clique ousted others who had been part of the revolution from having any voice in the government. Humberto Ortega, the Minister of Defense, declared Marxism-Leninism would be their guide, and so it is.

The Government of Nicaragua has imposed a new dictatorship. It has refused to hold the elections it promised. It has seized control of most media and subjects all media to heavy prior censorship. It denied the bishops and priests of the Roman Catholic Church the right to say Mass on radio during Holy Week. It insulted and mocked the Pope. It has driven the Miskito Indians from their homelands, burning their villages, destroying their crops, and forcing them into involuntary internment camps far from home. It has moved against the private sector and free labor unions. It condoned mob action against Nicaragua's independent human rights commission and drove the director of that commission into exile.

In short, after all these acts of repression by the government, is it any wonder that opposition has formed? Contrary to propaganda, the opponents of the Sandinistas are not diehard supporters of the previous Somoza regime. In fact, many are anti-Somoza heroes and fought beside the Sandinistas to bring down the Somoza government. Now they've been denied any part in the new government because they truly wanted democracy for Nicaragua and they still do. Others are Miskito Indians fighting for their homes, their lands, and their lives.

The Sandinista revolution in Nicaragua turned out to be just an exchange of one set of autocratic rulers for another, and the people still have no freedom, no democratic rights, and more poverty. Even worse than its predecessor, it is helping Cuba and the Soviets to destabilize our hemisphere.

Meanwhile, the Government of El Salvador, making every effort to guarantee democracy, free labor unions, freedom of religion, and a free press, is under attack by guerrillas dedicated to the same philosophy that prevails in Nicaragua, Cuba, and, yes, the Soviet Union. Violence has been Nicaragua's most important export to the world. It is the ultimate in hypocrisy for the unelected Nicaraguan Government to charge that we seek their overthrow, when they're doing everything they can to bring down the elected Government of El Salvador. [Applause] Thank you. The guerrilla attacks are directed from a headquarters in Managua, the capital of Nicaragua.

But let us be clear as to the American attitude toward the Government of Nicaragua. We do not seek its overthrow. Our interest is to ensure that it does not infect its neighbors through the export of subversion and violence. Our purpose, in conformity with American and international law, is to prevent the flow of arms to El Salvador, Honduras, Guatemala, and Costa Rica. We have attempted to have a dialog with the Government of Nicaragua, but it persists in its efforts to spread violence.

We should not, and we will not, protect the Nicaraguan Government from the anger of its own people. But we should, through diplomacy, offer an alternative. And as Nicaragua ponders its options, we can and will—with all the resources of diplomacy—protect each country of Central America from the danger of war.

Even Costa Rica, Central America's oldest and strongest democracy—a government so peaceful it doesn't even have an army—is the object of bullying and threats from Nicaragua's dictators.

Nicaragua's neighbors know that Sandinista promises of peace, nonalliance, and nonintervention have not been kept. Some 36 new military bases have been built. There were only 13 during the Somoza years. Nicaragua's new army numbers 25,000 men, supported by a militia of 50,000. It is the largest army in Central America, supplemented by 2,000 Cuban military and security advisers. It is equipped with the most modern weapons—dozens of Soviet-made tanks, 800 Soviet-bloc trucks, Soviet 152-millimeter howitzers, 100 anti-aircraft guns, plus planes and helicopters. There are additional thousands of civilian advisers from Cuba, the Soviet Union, East Germany, Libya, and the PLO. And we're attacked because we have 55 military trainers in El Salvador.

The goal of the professional guerrilla movements in Central America is as simple as it is sinister: to destabilize the entire region from the Panama Canal to Mexico. And if you doubt beyond this point, just consider what Cayetano Cárpio, the now-deceased Salvadoran guerrilla leader, said earlier this month. Cárpio said that after El Salvador falls, El Salvador and Nicaragua would be “arm-in-arm and struggling for the total liberation of Central America.”

Nicaragua's dictatorial junta, who themselves made war and won power operating from bases in Honduras and Costa Rica, like to pretend that they are today being attacked by forces based in Honduras. The fact is, it is Nicaragua's government that threatens Honduras, not the reverse. It is Nicaragua who has moved heavy tanks close to the border, and Nicaragua who speaks of war. It was Nicaraguan radio that announced on April 8th the creation of a new, unified, revolutionary coordinating board to push forward the Marxist struggle in Honduras.

Nicaragua, supported by weapons and military resources provided by the Communist bloc, represses its own people, refuses to make peace, and sponsors a guerrilla war against El Salvador.

President Truman's words are as apt today as they were in 1947 when he, too, spoke before a joint session of the Congress:⁵

"At the present moment in world history, nearly every nation must choose between alternate ways of life. The choice is not too often a free one. One way of life is based upon the will of the majority and is distinguished by free institutions, representative government, free elections, guarantees of individual liberty, freedom of speech and religion, and freedom from political oppression. The second way of life is based upon the will of a minority forcibly imposed upon the majority. It relies upon terror and oppression, a controlled press and radio, fixed elections, and the suppression of personal freedoms.

"I believe that it must be the policy of the United States to support free peoples who are resisting attempted subjugation by armed minorities or by outside pressures. I believe that we must assist free peoples to work out their own destinies in their own way. I believe that our help should be primarily through economic and financial aid which is essential to economic stability and orderly political processes.

"Collapse of free institutions and loss of independence would be disastrous not only for them but for the world. Discouragement and possibly failure would quickly be the lot of neighboring peoples striving to maintain their freedom and independence."

The countries of Central America are smaller than the nations that prompted President Truman's message. But the political and strategic stakes are the same. Will our response—economic, social, military—be as appropriate and successful as Mr. Truman's bold solutions to the problems of postwar Europe?

Some people have forgotten the successes of those years and the decades of peace, prosperity, and freedom they secured. Some people talk as though the United States were incapable of acting effectively in international affairs without risking war or damaging those we seek to help.

Are democracies required to remain passive while threats to their security and prosperity accumulate? Must we just accept the destabilization of an entire region from the Panama Canal to Mexico on our southern border? Must we sit by while independent nations of this hemisphere are integrated into the most aggressive empire the modern world has seen? Must we wait while Central Americans are driven from their homes like the more than a million who've sought refuge out of Afghanistan, or the 1½ million who have fled Indochina, or the more than a million Cubans who have fled Castro's Caribbean utopia? Must we, by default leave the people of El Salvador no choice but to flee their homes, creating another tragic human exodus?

I don't believe there's a majority in the Congress or the country that counsels passivity, resignation, defeatism, in the face of this challenge to freedom and security in our own hemisphere. [Applause] Thank you. Thank you.

I do not believe that a majority of the Congress or the country is prepared to stand by passively while the people of Central America are delivered to totalitarianism and we ourselves are left vulnerable to new dangers.

Only last week, an official of the Soviet Union reiterated Brezhnev's threat to station nuclear missiles in this hemisphere, 5 minutes from the United States. Like an echo, Nicaragua's Commandante Daniel Ortega confirmed that, if asked, his country would consider accepting those missiles. I understand that today they may be having second thoughts.⁶

Now, before I go any further, let me say to those who invoke the memory of Vietnam, there is no thought of sending American combat troops to Central America. They are not needed—[applause]—

Thank you. And, as I say, they are not needed and, indeed, they have not been requested there. All our neighbors ask of us is assistance in training and arms to protect themselves while they build a better, freer life.

We must continue to encourage peace among the nations of Central America. We must support the regional efforts now underway to promote solutions to regional problems.

We cannot be certain that the Marxist Leninist bands who believe war is an instrument of politics will be readily discouraged. It's crucial that we not become discouraged before they do. Otherwise, the region's freedom will be lost and our security damaged in ways that can hardly be calculated.

If Central America were to fall, what would the consequences be for our position in Asia, Europe, and for alliances such as NATO? If the United States cannot respond to a threat near our own borders, why should Europeans or Asians believe that we're seriously concerned about threats to them? If the Soviets can assume that nothing short of an

⁶ In an April 25 interview conducted in Managua, Ortega "rejected 'emphatically and definitively' that Nicaragua intended to install Soviet missiles, a notion that he said 'has arisen only in the mind' of the United States Administration. 'Our country will never be turned into the military base of anyone,' he said." (Marlise Simons, "Sandinistas Say U.S. Arms the Rebels: Leader Says Washington Seeks Front on Southern Border," New York Times, April 27, 1983, p. A15) actual attack on the United States will provoke an American response, which ally, which friend will trust us then?

The Congress shares both the power and the responsibility for our foreign policy. Tonight, I ask you, the Congress, to join me in a bold, generous approach to the problems of peace and poverty, democracy and dictatorship in the region. Join me in a program that prevents Communist victory in the short run, but goes beyond, to produce for the deprived people of the area the reality of present progress and the promise of more to come.

Let us lay the foundation for a bipartisan approach to sustain the independence and freedom of the countries of Central America. We in the administration reach out to you in this spirit.

We will pursue four basic goals in Central America:

First, in response to decades of inequity and indifference, we will support democracy, reform, and human freedom. This means using our assistance, our powers of persuasion, and our legitimate leverage to bolster humane democratic systems where they already exist and to help countries on their way to that goal complete the process as quickly as human institutions can be changed. Elections in El Salvador and also in Nicaragua must be open to all, fair and safe. The international community must help. We will work at human rights problems, not walk away from them.

Second, in response to the challenge of world recession and, in the case of El Salvador, to the unrelenting campaign of economic sabotage by the guerrillas, we will support economic development. And by a margin of 2 to 1 our aid is economic now, not military. Seventy-seven cents out of every dollar we will spend in the area this year goes for food, fertilizers, and other essentials for economic growth and development. And our economic program goes beyond traditional aid. The Caribbean Initiative introduced in the House earlier today will provide powerful trade and investment incentives to help these countries achieve self-sustaining economic growth without exporting U.S. jobs.⁷ Our goal must be to focus our immense and growing technology to enhance health care, agriculture, industry, and to ensure that we who inhabit this interdependent region come to know and understand each other better, retaining our diverse identities, respecting our diverse traditions and institutions.

And, third, in response to the military challenge from Cuba and Nicaragua—to their deliberate use of force to spread tyranny—we will support the security of the region's threatened nations. We do not view security assistance as an end in itself, but as a shield for democratization, economic development, and diplomacy. No amount of reform will bring peace so long as guerrillas believe they will win by force. No amount of economic help will suffice if guerrilla units can destroy roads and bridges and power stations and crops, again and again, with impunity. But with better training and material help, our neighbors can hold off the guerrillas and give democratic reform time to take root.

And, fourth, we will support dialog and negotiations both among the countries of the region and within each country. The terms and conditions of participation in elections are negotiable. Costa Rica is a shining example of democracy. Honduras has made the move from military rule to democratic government. Guatemala is pledged to the same course. The United States will work toward a political solution in Central America which will serve the interests of the democratic process.

To support these diplomatic goals, I offer these assurances: The United States will support any agreement among Central American countries for the withdrawal, under fully verifiable and reciprocal conditions, of all foreign military and security advisers and troops. We want to help opposition groups join the political process in all countries and compete by ballots instead of bullets. We will support any verifiable, reciprocal agreement among Central American countries on the renunciation of support for insurgencies on neighbors' territory. And, finally, we desire to help Central America end its costly arms race and will support any verifiable, reciprocal agreements on the nonimportation of offensive weapons.

To move us toward these goals more rapidly, I am tonight announcing my intention to name an Ambassador at Large as my special envoy to Central America.⁸ He or she will report to me through the Secretary of State. The Ambassador's responsibilities will be to lend U.S. support to the efforts of regional governments to bring peace to this troubled area and to work closely with the Congress to assure the fullest possible, bipartisan coordination of our policies toward the region.

What I'm asking for is prompt congressional approval for the full reprogramming of funds for key current economic and security programs so that the people of Central America can hold the line against externally supported aggression. In addition, I am asking for prompt action on the supplemental request in these same areas to carry us through the current fiscal year and for early and favorable congressional action on my requests for fiscal year 1984.

And finally, I am asking that the bipartisan consensus, which last year acted on the trade and tax provisions of the Caribbean Basin Initiative in the House, again take the lead to move this vital proposal to the floor of both Chambers.⁹ And, as I said before, the greatest share of these requests is targeted toward economic and humanitarian aid, not military.

What the administration is asking for on behalf of freedom in Central America is so small, so minimal, considering what is at stake. The total amount requested for aid to all of Central America in 1984 is about $600 million. That's less than one-tenth of what Americans will spend this year on coin-operated video games.

In summation, I say to you that tonight there can be no question: The national security of all the Americas is at stake in Central America. If we cannot defend ourselves there, we cannot expect to prevail elsewhere. Our credibility would collapse, our alliances would crumble, and the safety of our homeland would be put in jeopardy.

We have a vital interest, a moral duty, and a solemn responsibility. This is not a partisan issue. It is a question of our meeting our moral responsibility to ourselves, our friends, and our posterity. It is a duty that falls on all of us—the President, the Congress, and the people. We must perform it together. Who among us would wish to bear responsibility for failing to meet our shared obligation?

Thank you, God bless you, and good night.

⁹ See footnote 5, Document 139. On June 21, the House Ways and Means Committee approved H.R. 2769 (see footnote 7, above), and the full House passed the bill on July 14. The Senate Finance Committee approved its version of the bill on May 12, and the full Senate attached the Caribbean Basin proposals to the tax withholding bill (H.R. 2973). Although the President did not favor the tax legislation, he did sign the bill (P.L. 98-67; 97 Stat. 369) into law on August 5. (Congress and the Nation, vol. VI, 1981-1984, pp. 90, 106-107)

153. Memorandum From the Chairman of the Policy Planning Council (Bosworth) to the Under Secretary of State for Political Affairs (Eagleburger)¹

Washington, May 27, 1983

SUBJECT

Foreign Policy Coordination

Rather than give you a proposed agenda for the first meeting, I thought it might be helpful to tick off a number of different foreign policy issues that cut across geographical and functional bureau lines.² Once you have a chance to reflect on these topics, and others that may occur to you during your trip to Yugoslavia, we can put together an agenda for the first meeting.

You might want to consider some of the following issues:

—Soviet direct and indirect (proxy) actions which affect US interests in the Third World. This could deal with Cuban, Libyan, Vietnamese and other proxy activities. It also could address how best to support US friends vulnerable to such Soviet supported actions and to raise the cost for the proxies themselves.³

—Conventional Arms Transfers. One issue here is how Soviet arms transfer policy undercuts our interests globally and how best to deal with it (counter-transfers, economic aid, etc.). Another issue is the allied dimension.

—*What has replaced the Nixon Doctrine?*⁴ The Nixon Doctrine focused on support for regional powers with whom we could work to defend

² In a May 19 memorandum to Crocker, Enders, Wolfowitz, Burt, Veliotis, and Bosworth, Eagleburger expressed his concern "over the tendency to look at issues very narrowly with little regard to our overall foreign policy objectives. One reason this occurs is that there is insufficient contact between bureaus, particularly at the policy levels." Noting that the situation had to be addressed, he wrote: "Therefore, as much as I dislike meetings, I want to schedule regular one-hour sessions every two weeks so that we can discuss foreign policy issues that cut across bureau lines. If you are in town, I expect you to be there. If not, your senior deputy should attend." Eagleburger also assigned responsibility to S/P to develop the agenda for each meeting. (Ibid.)

³ Eagleburger placed two vertical lines and a checkmark in the right-hand margin next to this point.

⁴ During a tour of Asia in July 1969, Nixon outlined what would become one of the major foreign policy themes of his administration. In reference to the U.S. role vis-à-vis Asia, he declared that the United States would stand by its treaty commitments but expect Asian nations to shoulder their own defense burdens. For additional information on the Nixon Doctrine, see Foreign Relations, 1969–1976, vol. I, Foundations of Foreign Policy, 1969–1972, Document 29, and Public Papers: Nixon, 1969, pp. 544–556.

US interests (e.g. Iran and Persian Gulf). Having passed through the post-Vietnam period and the fall of Iran, etc, do we have a coherent conceptual approach for dealing with this important and fundamental foreign and security policy problem?⁵

—Non-proliferation Policy. We have a first draft of a paper on non-proliferation for our Foreign Policy Directions project⁶ and will be sharing it with the Secretary, Ken Dam and you after we have had an opportunity to staff it and talk with Dick Kennedy. That might lay the basis for a useful future meeting of your group on how our non-proliferation and foreign policy interests intersect.

—Arms control. How do we move our European allies (especially Germany and the Scandalux countries) away from their near obsession with arms control as the central focus of all security policy, without further undermining the Administration's credibility in terms of support for arms control? The answer, obviously, is gradually, but we need a fuller answer. More importantly, we need a genuine strategy. A EUR/PM paper is working on this subject in the Foreign Policy Directions project, but so far has a long way to go.

—Europe and Central America. Two key issues occur to me: 1) the diversion question (the extent to which US attention and material resources might need to be diverted from Europe to our own backyard should things go badly in Central America); and 2) how to get the Europeans to recognize that scoring domestic points off of us on Central America can weaken support for the Atlantic connection?⁷

—Unilateralism. The most obvious (and deeply troubling) issue here is how American and European (especially German) unilateralist tendencies tend to reinforce each other (despite their mutual antipathy) and thereby undermine allied common purposes and solidarity. The unilateralism issue, however, has its application in US relations with other parts of the world; that might be explored productively with all the regional bureaus.

—The US and Europe (and Japan) in the Middle East. Since Suez, US-European discord over the Middle East has been a major irritant in Atlantic alliance relations.⁸ It also has emerged as a point of friction

with Japan. Is there any way we can improve policy management of this problem, or should we basically settle for practical cooperation on specific issues (MFN) while ignoring differences at the level of basic and declaratory policy.⁹

—Engaging the Japanese in our global foreign policy. You recently approved an S/P paper, focusing on aid policy, that the Secretary gave to Foreign Minister Abe on this issue. The Secretary obviously is interested in developing this further. The regional bureaus might be of some help in identifying opportunities for cooperation in their areas.¹⁰

—US-Chinese strategic cooperation—in and out of Asia. This won't be easy in light of currently sour relations. However, if we can begin to turn things around (through technology transfer, etc.) there may be greater opportunities.¹¹ We should use our time now to ask ourselves what we would like from the Chinese. For example, would it be feasible in the right political conditions to gain Chinese cooperation concerning reinforcement of the Persian Gulf in crisis situations via Chinese airfields? This may not be the best example but it is one that Chas Freeman once mentioned to Phil Kaplan. I think we ought to look at what might be feasible, and in the mutual US-PRC interest.

—The Sino-Soviet dialogue. What are the prospects? What might rapprochement portend for US global interests? What are the policy implications now, and depending upon what eventually might come about in that relationship.

—Horn of Africa. We should consider here the interconnections among the ostensibly fraying Libya-Ethiopia-PDRY axis, the Soviet connection, the Sudan's precarious situation, opportunities for Somali-Kenyan reconciliation and potential contributions from the Saudis and other OPEC sources.

—Latin American (e.g. Brazil)-African relationships. How important? How do they affect US interests? How could we protect our interests?

This obviously is an off the top of the head list and we will be thinking about it some more. One final rather procedural point might be worth taking up in this first meeting—the need to get the bureaus to focus somewhat more on composite US national interests (which is why you are initiating these meetings) and a good deal less on defending their clients. If you could achieve this out of your exercise, we would give you the Order of the Eagle with three oak leaf clusters.¹²

⁹ Eagleburger placed two vertical lines and a checkmark in the right-hand margin next to this point.

¹⁰ Eagleburger placed a vertical line in the left-hand margin next to this point and wrote: "Also—How to bring Japan into [unclear] in Eur." He also placed two vertical lines and two checkmarks in the right-hand margin next to this point. The S/P paper has not been found.

¹²Eagleburger placed a vertical line in the right-hand margin next to this paragraph, drew a line to the bottom of the memorandum, and wrote: "Should [unclear] the [unclear] focus of the 1st. mtg." He also underlined "the need to get the bureaus to focus somewhat more on composite US national interests," placed two vertical lines in the adjacent left-hand margin, and wrote "yes. He also placed two vertical lines in the left-hand margin next to the last sentence of the paragraph and wrote: "Amen!!"

154. Letter From President Reagan to Richard Nixon¹

Washington, June 1, 1983

Dear Dick:

While I had earlier expressed my concurrence with your article appearing in The Wall Street Journal, "Don't Let Salvador Become Another Vietnam," I wish to tell you how thoroughly I agree with your analysis.²

As you so persuasively illustrate, the significant Vietnam/Salvador parallels are not those sometimes urged upon Americans by liberal writers.³ The important parallels are instead the arming of guerrillas with Soviet-bloc weapons, the demands that the governments negotiate and share power with the communists before elections and, most importantly, the terrible consequences to the country, its citizens, and its neighbors in the event of submission to a communist regime.

Your article should also bring home to all Americans where the parallel ends. Unlike the expansion of communism into bordering states on the other side of the world, voluntary submission to further Soviet-bloc

³Nixon wrote: "There are chilling parallels between what is happening in El Salvador and what happened in Vietnam. In both cases, the myth that what is involved is simply a civil war with guerrilla forces armed with pitchforks and a few weapons captured from the government has been exploded. In Vietnam, we now know from the North Vietnamese themselves that the Soviet Union was the primary arms supplier to the guerrillas in South Vietnam. In El Salvador, it has been clearly established that the guerrillas are primarily armed with Soviet-bloc weapons funneled through Cuba, Nicaragua and Libya." (Ibid.)

control in Central America would constitute a weakening of our resolve and the beginning of the conflict for communist control of the United States itself. Can reasoning, informed Americans let this happen?

Thank you for the public statement of truths which seriously concern me.

155. Memorandum From President Reagan to Secretary of State Shultz and Secretary of Defense Weinberger¹

Washington, June 7, 1983

SUBJECT

Goals and Priorities (C)

With 18 months of our first term remaining we have accomplished a great deal but have a considerable number of demands and opportunities before us. Now is an appropriate time to review the agenda, to evaluate the potential for progress in various areas, to set priorities, and to identify the resources and investments of time and effort essential to success. (C)

What has been accomplished. In the course of the past two and one-half years we have reversed perceptions abroad—by friend and foe alike—of the United States as a nation in decline, no longer able to define its interests and defend them. The catalyst for this evolution in perceptions has been the articulation of new policies in the following areas:

—Firm commitment to the restoration of the military foundation of our national security policies.

—Establishing a new relationship with the Soviet Union based upon the principles of reciprocity and restraint.

—Restoring confidence and cohesion among our allies.

—Defining a comprehensive and responsible policy for the reduction of strategic and general purpose armaments.

—Establishing a new basis for the conduct of relations with developing countries.

—Maintaining a firm commitment to lead in efforts to bring peace to troubled regions (Middle East, Southern Africa, etc.)

In addition, we have established a disciplined decision-making and policy-planning process through which we have conducted a number of broad regional policy studies. (C)

The Next 18 Months. Much remains to be done within this system to extrapolate from the broad regional policy studies to how we will conduct our affairs with individual countries (e.g., U.S. relations with Korea, Yugoslavia, etc.). One can say that we would leave a commendable legacy were we to do no more than to focus our efforts on completing an additional 75–80 country/issue studies thereby leaving on the shelf a coherent set of policies. But to do so would of course be to ignore the demands for U.S. leadership on the one hand and the opportunities on the other. Each Administration is also faced with ideas whose time has come and which require leadership to come into fruition. The purpose of this memo is to ask your help in taking a look ahead in your areas in an effort to define these demands and opportunities and begin to work together toward those three or four goals which is about the limit of what any President can realistically hope to achieve. (C)

Within the next two—three weeks, I would like to ask you to reflect on the demands and opportunities in your respective areas and submit as detailed a forecast of your recommendations as possible. By forecast, I intend your priority objectives together with your prescription of the actions/milestones along the way to meeting them. You should include specific elaboration of my involvement through public/congressional addresses and/or meetings, foreign travel and any major reallocations of resources necessary to the promotion of your proposed objectives. Below I list some of the more obvious items on our common agenda. It is by no means exhaustive. Still I want to emphasize that the intention of this request is to identify and begin to flesh out a strategy for achievement of those three or four goals which we can reasonably hope to achieve in the first term. (C)

Your proposals will inevitably include actions by others in receipt of this memo. Please include the fullest possible detail. (U)

I ask that Bill Clark convene a meeting soon to review our thoughts and then to seek your help in integrating these individual efforts into an overall strategic agenda by the first of July. (C)

Common Objectives:

—The Middle East (withdrawal of all foreign forces from Lebanon and agreement on autonomy arrangements for the West Bank and Gaza).

—Arms Control (A START agreement? INF? Agreement of Confidence Building Measures?).

—Launching of the MX program together with sustaining the strategic modernization program.

—Forging improved cooperation among countries of the Western Hemisphere.

—Pacific Basin Initiative. (C)

156. Editorial Note

Secretary of State George Shultz delivered the commencement address at Stanford University in Stanford, California, on June 12, 1983. In his address, Shultz emphasized the “common responsibility” shared by democracies facing “a new set of challenges”: “American students graduating today have many worries, I am sure. You must be anxious about your careers and your future. Yet there is one category of worries that, I daresay, you do not have. You are not concerned that the threat of imprisonment or torture hangs over you if you say or write or do the ‘wrong’ thing. You have no fear of the policeman’s midnight knock on the door. Considering how few democracies there are in this world, what we have in common with our allies is, therefore, something precious: systems of constitutional, representative government; systems of law that guarantee basic political and civil rights and freedoms; open economic systems that give free rein to individual talent and initiative.

“Most alliances in history have not lasted. The fact that the democracies have been held together by ties of political, economic, and security cooperation for more than three decades, through many profound changes in international conditions, is proof, I believe, that our unity of shared values and common purpose is something special.

“At the same time, the grim lesson of history should warn us that even this great coalition will not survive without conscious effort and political commitment. Those statesmen who were ‘present at the creation’ in the immediate postwar period showed enormous vision and courage. In a new era of history, it is up to all of us to summon the same vision and courage to assure that it survives and flourishes.

“Therefore, it is of enormous importance that our moral unity is today being so effectively translated into political unity. It is important that old divisions within the alliance are narrowing, as shown by the fact that the ministerial meeting I just attended was held in Paris for the first time in 17 years. It is important that the alliance is attractive enough for new countries to want to join—the original 12 now number 16. It is important that the 24 industrial democracies grouped in the OECD have worked out a framework for a consensus on the difficult issue of East-West trade, based on a thoughtful analysis of the balance of interests in economic relations with communist systems.

“Outside the formal alliance framework, British, French, and Italian soldiers now stand alongside our Marines protecting Beirut. Our Atlantic allies, Japan, and other countries around the world are supporting our efforts to promote the withdrawal of all external forces from Lebanon. Britain, France, West Germany, Canada, and the United States are working together as a ‘contact group’ to help reach a negotiated arrangement for the independence of Namibia. And all the diverse Williamsburg summit partners—including Japan—joined in an impressive joint statement on security and arms control.

“Thus, for all our occasional squabbles, the democratic nations have not forgotten the paramount importance of the values and interests we have in common.

“In the economic dimension as well, experience teaches that cooperation is essential. We now live in an interdependent world in which each country’s well-being, primarily its own responsibility is, nevertheless, affected powerfully by the health of the global economy, for which the industrial democracies bear a special responsibility.

“In the 1970s, the plagues of recession, oil shocks, and inflation spread across national boundaries. The impact was not only economic but political. There was great concern that these ills would weaken not only Western economies but the cohesion of Western societies. If democratic governments proved unable to deal effectively with their economic problems, societies would be under continuing strain, social divisions would be aggravated, and we might have faced a demoralizing crisis of democracy. Increasing resort to protectionism, choking off world trade and compounding the recession, could have undermined relations between allies. These political divisions, as well as budgetary pressures, threatened to weaken the common defense.

“The free nations had learned, however, from the experience of the 1930s, when the failure of cooperation gave birth to widespread protectionism, which deepened the Great Depression. This time the free nations began the practice of holding yearly economic summits and intensified their cooperation in many other forums, multilateral and bilateral. So we can hope that the common sense of the body politic will prevail over the drive of special interests for protective treatment.

“As the Williamsburg declaration testifies: ‘The recession has put our societies through a severe test, but they have proved resilient.’ Rather than economic stagnation, we are seeing the impressive capacity of open economies to regain their vitality. Growth with low inflation has resumed in the United States, Japan, West Germany, Britain, and other countries which together account for about three-quarters of the production of the industrialized world. If we have truly wrung inflation out of our system, and if we all maintain discipline in our national policies, the world could be headed for a long period of sustained noninflationary growth. Those are big ‘ifs,’ I know, but our experience should tell us that the job can be done and that we will be much better off as we do it.

“It is essential that we resist protectionism, which could hinder this recovery. The Williamsburg summit partners candidly acknowledged to each other that every country’s record is spotty on this score. But they committed themselves ‘to halt protectionism, and as recovery proceeds to reverse it by dismantling trade barriers.’ New efforts of trade liberalization would be especially beneficial to the developing countries: in 1980, their export earnings of $580 billion amounted to 17 times their net receipts from foreign aid.

“For all our temporary setbacks, the free economies have brought about since 1945 an era of growth and prosperity unprecedented in history. On the Eastern side of the divided Continent of Europe, economic problems are systemic. Inefficiencies are built in; innovation is inhibited; effective economic reforms are excluded because they would weaken the grip of centralized Soviet political control. In contrast, our economic difficulties are largely problems of self-discipline, of better management of fiscal and monetary policy to permit the inherent vitality of the free economic system to show its power. The weakness of Soviet-style economies is structural. We have reason for confidence, for our economic future is in our own hands.

“Unfortunately, the Soviet system is very proficient in another sphere: the accumulation of military power. Therefore, security must remain a priority area of cooperation. If the values and interests we have in common are truly precious to us, then we have a duty to defend them. The summit partners at Williamsburg made very clear that they have learned this lesson. Let me read to you from their joint statement:

“As leaders of our seven countries, it is our first duty to defend the freedom and justice on which our democracies are based. To this end, we shall maintain sufficient military strength to deter any attack, to counter any threat, and to ensure the peace. . . . The security of our countries is indivisible and must be approached on a global basis. . . . We have a vision of a world in which the shadow of war has been lifted from all mankind, and we are determined to pursue that vision.’

“In an age of nuclear weapons, maintaining collective security is no easy task. ‘A nuclear war cannot be won and must never be fought.’ That’s a quote from Ronald Reagan. Our challenge is really twofold: we must both defend freedom and preserve the peace. We must seek to advance those moral values to which this nation and its allies are deeply committed. And we must do so in a nuclear age in which a global war would thoroughly destroy those values. As the President pointed out in Los Angeles on March 31, our task is ‘one of the most complex moral challenges faced by any generation.’

“We and our allies have agreed for decades on a twofold strategy for meeting this challenge. First, we are committed to ensuring the military balance, modernizing our forces, and maintaining vigilance. Second, we are prepared for and committed to constructive dialogue with our adversaries, to address the sources of tension, resolve political conflicts, and reduce the burden and danger of armaments.

“We cannot find security in arms alone. We are willing to negotiate differences, but we cannot do so effectively if we are weak or if the Soviet Union believes it can achieve its objectives without any compromise. Therefore, both these tracks—strength and diplomacy—are essential.

“Unfortunately, the democratic nations have tended to neglect their defense responsibilities. Some serious problems have resulted and are now coming home to roost. They underlie many of the current controversies. In the 1970s, the trauma of Vietnam caused the United States to reduce its armed forces and reduce real defense spending, at the same time that the Soviet Union, in the wake of the Cuban missile crisis, was embarked on a relentless buildup in all categories of military power—strategic, conventional, and naval. Once the United States lost its unquestioned strategic superiority over the Soviet Union, NATO’s defense—which relies on the commitment of American strategic power—became much more complicated. Yet NATO conventional forces continue to be inadequate.

Ironically, NATO's success in keeping the peace in Europe for more than three decades leads some to take peace for granted and to forget the crucial role NATO has played in guaranteeing it.

"The unprecedented expansion of Soviet power over the past two decades cannot be ignored or rationalized away. Any president, any administration, would be forced to respond. We have seen too often that an imbalance of power is an invitation to conflict. Therefore, this administration, and our allies, are committed to maintenance of the military balance in Europe and globally.

"Surely the burden of proof is on those who would undo the present military balance, or alter it, or conduct risky experiments with unilateral concessions without genuinely reducing the levels of armaments on both sides.

"At the same time, experience teaches that a balance of power, though necessary, is not sufficient. Our strength is a means to an end; it is the secure foundation for our effort to build a safer, more peaceful, and more hopeful world. On the basis of strength, the cohesion of our alliance, and a clear view of our own objectives, we must never be afraid to negotiate.

"This is our attitude to arms control. As NATO decided in December 1979, for example, we intend to modernize our intermediate-range nuclear forces in Europe to counter the Soviet deployment of over 1,000 nuclear warheads on their new intermediate-range missiles (SS-20s). But we are also willing to eliminate this entire category of nuclear weapons from the face of the earth; and we are prepared, as an interim step, to reduce these forces to any equal, verifiable level.

"If negotiations do not succeed, however, we must be prepared to deploy at the end of this year as decided in 1979. The Soviet Union has no higher priority goal at the moment than to intimidate NATO into canceling its deployments unilaterally, thereby leaving the Soviet Union with its massive monopoly of new missiles and warheads already in place. As the summit partners made unanimously clear at Williamsburg, the alliance cannot, and will not, permit this to happen.

"At Williamsburg and at NATO, we saw an impressive consensus on security and arms control. This is a firm ground for confidence that war will be deterred, that stability will be maintained, and that we will have a chance at least to reach reliable agreements making the world that you inherit a safer place.

"The final lesson I want to leave you with is this: experience teaches us that nothing is foreordained. Nations, like individuals, have choices to make. History is filled with many examples of nations and individuals that made the wrong choices; there are also many examples of foresight, wisdom, and courage.

"Democracies are sometimes slow to awaken to their challenges. But once they are aroused, no force on earth is more powerful than free peoples working together with clear purpose and determination.

“Therefore, I have confidence in the future. You new graduates, with your energy, talent, creativity, represent the promise of that future. Few others are so fortunate. Few others have such a responsibility.

“And now, my congratulations to you, to your parents, and to Stanford, and my very best wishes to all of you.” (Department of State Bulletin, July 1983, pages 63–65)

157. Memorandum From the President’s Assistant for National Security Affairs (Clark) to President Reagan¹

Washington, June 14, 1983

SUBJECT

National Security Priorities—Where Are We Going and How Are We Going to Get There

By this time, you have undoubtedly surveyed the global possibilities for making significant gains—for accomplishing something truly important—in the next year. In looking at the horizon there are some places where we are committed and must devote a lot of time and energy to simply holding your own, e.g., El Salvador. In other areas, we could take a lower profile without great risk, e.g., East Asia, but where the potential for opening a truly new direction of emphasis in U.S. foreign policy is very high. In still other areas, e.g., the Middle East, I believe we have lost a chance to achieve truly strategic gains, but could still lose a lot; consequently, we must stay engaged. Finally with regard to whether or not we stand to make any progress in US-Soviet relations, thoughtful men can make a case on both sides. An expanding school of thought states that the U.S. is in the best position in thirty years to negotiate and get results with the Russians.² They base this not only on the clear restoration of our military strength³ which you have set in motion (and which the Soviets know will leave them in second place within ten years), but also on the terribly important political base of support you have garnered in Europe in the last six months. Added to this, some point to the personal interests Andropov might have in outflanking his “softer” colleagues in the Kremlin by getting a summit at which a good arms control (read constraining U.S. arms) agreement is achieved.

The detractors say that it is too soon to expect to achieve real concessions from the Soviets; that we have sustained the conservative consensus for only two years and that the Russians will wait us out for at least another year.

I tend to side more with the former school—that is, to go ahead to engage the Soviets in serious efforts to solve problems—as long as we do it in a sensible way using our leverage sparingly and not being suckered.

But before we go further to decide any of these issues, we must face the fact that if we try to make progress in all these areas—East-West relations, the Middle East, the Pacific Basin and Central America—we face the very real prospect of failing in all of them. We simply don’t have the resources in this Administration—no Administration does—to undertake four major national security campaigns simultaneously. For example, if you were to decide to make a major effort to make another step—achieving autonomy for the West Bank—in the Middle East this would require whomever you assign this task, to spend full time on it. The corollary is that the person would be unable to do anything else. Thus if George Shultz does that, he would be unable to work, say, on Central America. When Kissinger was trying to get a partial disengagement between Israel and Egypt in 1974,⁴ he was out of the United States for more than six months of the year. What happens to Central America while the Secretary of State is gone, much less to any hope of making progress with the Russians?

My point is that we need to: (1) Set some priorities—what do you want to achieve; and (2) Divide the labor so that we apply our resources wisely. In addition to a division of labor we need to take a long look ahead to assure that your involvement is timed properly and planned in advance. Specifically, when should you travel? Where should you go? Why should you go there? In short, we should focus on your activities in a way that does not involve a travelogue to Asia simply because you have not been there, but because it is part of a plan. Most importantly, we should reach the spring of next year having achieved something specific to make the world a better place.

I have my own ideas on these matters. I believe, however, that rather than my sending them to you, all of your advisors would benefit from a closely held "strategic review of the bidding." At such a session, George, Cap, Bill and I could lay out our appraisal of what is within the realm of possibility in the next year and how we might go about dividing the labor and laying out a strategy for getting there.

George has asked to see you Wednesday afternoon.⁵ If you agree, I believe it would be worthwhile to ask that he, together with Cap and Bill if you wish, be prepared to discuss the big picture. Without this pause to get your sense of vision, I am afraid we will end up a year from now having "minded the store" but without much to show for it.⁶

⁶In the margin below this paragraph, Clark wrote: "Mr. President, I would like your comments before our meeting—Bill."

158. Editorial Note

On June 15, 1983, Secretary of State George Shultz testified before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee concerning U.S.-Soviet relations. Committee Chair Charles Percy (R-Illinois) chaired the hearings and began by welcoming Shultz. He then stated that he believed this would "be among the most important hearings that I have participated in in the years that I have been on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee." He continued, "The subject of these hearings, the United States and the Soviet Union, in an atomic and nuclear age, is one of the most important subjects presented to mankind and to history. How do these two so-called superpowers respond and react with the kind of power that they possess? How can we prevent miscalculation? How can we prevent what so many young people are so cynical about occurring in their lifetimes, the possibility of a nuclear war?"

Before Shultz began his statement, Percy called upon the ranking minority member of the Committee Senator Claiborne Pell (D-Rhode Island) for any comments he "would like to make." Pell responded, in part: "Now, in my mind, the peril that we face is greater now than it was 2½ years ago, when this administration took over. I hope I am wrong, and I hope that your testimony will show that I am wrong, but I think a very increasing crescendo of administration rhetoric, although somewhat subdued in the last few weeks, has alarmed people. Also, the departure of people who really, while of a conservative cast, believed strongly and vigorously in arms control, like Gene Rostow, or Tom Enders, who believed in the two-track approach in Central America, has made us concerned about what the real direction of the administration is.

“Again, I hope the testimony and the facts, which are most important, will show that our situation is not worsening from the viewpoint of the possibility of war.”

Percy then directed Shultz to offer his statement. Shultz thanked the Committee and stated: “I appreciate the opportunity to meet with you and discuss our approach to United States-Soviet relations in the context of our broader foreign policy. As you have suggested, this has all sorts of dimensions to it that weigh on people’s minds. And it is, of course, a subject that I have thought about a great deal.

“The President has not only taken the time to talk with me about this, but has read through this testimony and made a few suggestions, which I found it possible to accept, and has signed off on the testimony. I feel very confident in saying that I am speaking not only for myself, but for the President in this statement.

“The management of our relations with the Soviet Union is of utmost importance. That relationship touches virtually every aspect of our international concerns and objectives, political, economic, and military, and every part of the world.

“We must defend our interests and values against a powerful Soviet adversary that threatens both. And we must do so in a nuclear age, in which a global war would even more thoroughly threaten those interests and values. As President Reagan pointed out on March 31: ‘We must both defend freedom and preserve the peace. We must stand true to our principles and our friends while preventing a holocaust.’ It is, as he said, ‘one of the most complex moral challenges ever faced by any generation.’

“We and the Soviets have sharply divergent goals and philosophies of political and moral order; these differences will not soon go away. Any other assumption is unrealistic. At the same time, we have a fundamental common interest in the avoidance of war. This common interest impels us to work toward a relationship between our nations that can lead to a safer world for all mankind.

“But a safer world will not be realized through good will. Our hopes for the future must be grounded in a realistic assessment of the challenge we face and in a determined effort to create the conditions that will make their achievement possible. We have made a start. Every postwar American President has come sooner or later to recognize that peace must be built on strength. President Reagan has long recognized this reality.

“In the past 2 years this Nation—the President in partnership with the Congress—has made a fundamental commitment to restoring its military and economic power and moral and spiritual strength. And having begun to rebuild our strength, we now seek to engage the Soviet leaders in a constructive dialog—a dialog through which we hope to find political solutions to outstanding issues.

“This is the central goal we have pursued since the outset of this administration. We do not want to—and need not—accept as inevitable the prospect of endless, dangerous confrontation with the Soviet Union. For if we do, then many of the great goals that the United States pursues in world affairs—peace, human rights, economic progress, national independence—will also be out of reach. We can—and must—do better.”

Shultz explained that the remainder of his testimony would focus on the “challenge posed by the Soviet Union’s international behavior” and the “strategy which that challenge requires of us,” the “steps this administration has taken to implement this strategy,” and, finally, “the specific issues that make up the agenda for United States-Soviet dialog and negotiation. Regarding this latter point, Shultz asserted: “In this dialog, our agenda is as follows: To seek improvement in Soviet performance on human rights, which you emphasized, Mr. Chairman, in your opening statement; to reduce the risk of war, reduce armaments through sound agreements, and ultimately ease the burdens of military spending; to manage and resolve regional conflicts; and to improve bilateral relations on the basis of reciprocity and mutual interest.

“This is a rigorous and comprehensive agenda, and our approach to it is principled, practical, and patient. We have pressed each issue in a variety of forums, bilateral and multilateral. We have made clear that the concerns we raise are not ours alone, but are shared by our allies and friends in every region of the globe. We have made clear that each of our concerns is serious. The Soviets know that we do not intend to abandon any of them merely because agreement cannot be reached quickly, or because agreement has been reached on others.

“Let me briefly review the state of our dialog in each of these areas.

“Human rights is a major issue on our agenda. To us it is a matter of real concern that Soviet emigration is at its lowest level since the 1960’s, and that Soviet constriction of emigration has coincided with a general crackdown against all forms of internal dissent. The Helsinki monitoring groups have all been dispersed and their leaders have been imprisoned or expelled from the country. And the Soviet Union’s first independent disarmament group has been harassed and persecuted.

“We address such questions both multilaterally and bilaterally. In such forums as the U.N. Human Rights Commission, the International Labor Organization, and especially the Review Conference of CSCE—where Max Kampelman is doing a truly outstanding job—we have made clear that human rights cannot be relegated to the margins of international politics. Our Soviet interlocutors have a different view; they seek to dismiss human rights as a 'tenth-rate issue,' not worthy of high-level attention.

"But our approach will not change. Americans know that national rights and individual rights cannot realistically be kept separate. We believe, for example, that the elements of the postwar European 'settlement' that were adopted by the parties to the Helsinki Final Act in 1975 form an integral whole; no one part will survive alone. Guided by this conviction, we and our allies have held at the Madrid Review Conference that movement in one 'basket' of this settlement—such as the convening of a European disarmament conference—must be matched by progress in other 'baskets,' especially human rights.

"We insist on this balance because we believe that international obligations must be taken seriously by the governments that assume them. But there is also a deeper reason that directly concerns the question of security.

"In Europe, as elsewhere, governments that are not at peace with their own people are unlikely to be on good terms with their neighbors. The only significant use of military force on the continent of Europe since 1945 has been by the Soviet Union against its East European 'allies.' As long as this unnatural relationship continues between the U.S.S.R. and its East European neighbors, it is bound to be a source of instability in Europe.

"We have been just as concerned about human rights issues on a bilateral as on a multilateral basis. The need for steady improvement of Soviet performance in the most important human rights categories is as central to the Soviet-American dialog as any other theme. Sometimes we advance this dialog best through public expressions of our concerns, at other times through quiet diplomacy. What counts, and the Soviets know this, is whether we see results.

"Let me turn to arms control, our second agenda item. We believe the only arms control agreements that count are those that provide for real reductions, equality, verifiability, and enhanced stability in the East-West balance. Success in our negotiations will not, of course, bring East-West competition to an end. But sustainable agreements will enable us to meet the Soviet challenge in a setting of greater stability and safety.

"The United States is now applying these principles in an ambitious program of arms control negotiations including INF [intermediate range nuclear forces], START [strategic arms reduction talks], MBFR [mutual and balanced force reductions], and the ongoing discussions in the U.N. Committee on Disarmament in Geneva. If we can reach a balanced agreement in the CSCE at Madrid, we would be prepared to participate also in a conference on disarmament in Europe.

"No previous administration has put so many elements of the East-West military equation on the negotiating table. You are aware of the U.S. position in the various talks, so I need not go into great detail. I will, however, touch on a few main points.

"In the strategic arms reduction talks, the United States has focused on the most destabilizing strategic systems, land-based ballistic missiles. Our objective is to strengthen deterrence while enhancing strategic stability through reductions. The President has proposed reductions in ballistic missile warheads by one-third. In presenting a comprehensive proposal, he has indicated that all strategic weapons are 'on the table.' Although our respective positions are far apart, the Soviets apparently accept the proposition that an agreement must involve significant reductions. This is progress.

"We have recently undertaken a full review of the U.S. position, which included an assessment of the Scowcroft Commission's recommendations and some thoughtful suggestions from the Congress. One week ago, the President announced that he is willing to raise the deployed missile ceiling in accordance with the Scowcroft recommendations. He also announced that he has given our negotiators new flexibility to explore all appropriate avenues for achieving reductions. It is now up to the Soviet Union to reciprocate our flexibility.

"We have also tabled a draft agreement on confidence-building measures that calls for exchange of information and advance notification of ballistic missile launches and major exercises. We want to move forward promptly to negotiate separate agreements on these very important measures, which would enhance stability in a crisis as well as symbolizing the common interest in preventing war. Yet another effort to prevent misperception of military activities on either side, and thus to lower the risk of war, is the President's recent proposal to expand and upgrade crisis communications between Washington and Moscow. Here, too, we hope for early agreement.

"In the negotiations on intermediate range nuclear forces, 'equal rights and limits' between the United States and the Soviet Union is one of our key principles. President Reagan's proposal of November 1981 sought to achieve the complete elimination of those systems on each side about which the other has expressed the greatest concern, that is, longer range, land-based INF missiles.

"We still regard this as the most desirable outcome. Yet after more than a year of talks, the Soviets continue to resist this equitable and effective solution. In fact, their position has not substantially changed since it was first put forward nearly a year ago. The proposal made by Mr. Andropov last December would allow the Soviet Union to maintain its overwhelming monopoly of longer range INF missiles while prohibiting the deployment of even one comparable U.S. missile.

“In an effort to break this stalemate, the President has proposed an interim agreement as a route to the eventual elimination of long-range INF systems. Under such an agreement, we would reduce the number of missiles we plan to deploy in Europe if the Soviet Union will reduce the total number of warheads it has already deployed to an equal level. This would result in equal limits for both sides on a global basis. Reflecting the concerns of our Asian allies and friends, we have made it clear that no agreement can come at their expense. We hope that in the current round of negotiations, the Soviets will move to negotiate in good faith on the President’s proposal, which was unanimously supported by our partners at the Williamsburg Summit.

“In the mutual and balanced force reduction talks in Vienna, NATO and the Warsaw Pact are discussing an agreement on conventional forces in Central Europe, the most heavily armed region of the world, where Warsaw Pact forces greatly exceed NATO’s.

“Last year the President announced a new Western position in the form of a draft treaty calling for substantial reductions to equal manpower levels. Although the Soviets and their allies have agreed to the principle of parity, which is progress, further progress has been prevented by inability to resolve disagreement over existing Warsaw Pact force levels and by problems of verification.

“In the 40-nation Committee on Disarmament in Geneva, the United States has introduced a far-reaching proposal for a comprehensive ban on chemical weapons, an agreement which would eliminate these terrible weapons from world arsenals. This initiative has been vigorously supported by our allies and friends, as well as many non-aligned nations. Our emphasis on the importance of mandatory on-site inspections has been widely applauded. An independent, impartial verification system, observed by and responsive to all parties, is essential to create confidence that the ban is being respected.

“In other areas, we have proposed to the Soviet Union improvements in the verification provisions of two agreements to limit underground nuclear testing. So far the Soviet response has been negative. We have also initiated a dialog with the Soviets in one area where our respective approaches very often coincide: nuclear nonproliferation.

“We should not anticipate early agreement in any of these negotiations. The Soviets have their own positions, and they are tough, patient negotiators. But we believe that our positions are fair and evenhanded and that our objectives are realistic.

“Let me turn now to regional issues, which are the third item of our agenda and have historically been the matters that have most upset our relationship with the Soviet Union.

“Important as it is, arms control has not been and cannot be the dominant subject of our dialog with the Soviets. We must also address the threat to peace posed by the Soviet exploitation of regional instability and conflict. Indeed, these issues, arms control and political instability, are closely related. The increased stability that we try to build into the superpower relationship through arms control can be undone by irresponsible Soviet policies elsewhere. In our numerous discussions with the Soviet leadership, we have repeatedly expressed our strong interest in reaching understandings with the Soviets that would minimize superpower involvement in conflicts beyond their borders.

"The list of problem areas is formidable, but we have insisted that regional issues are central to progress. We have made clear our commitment to relieve repression and economic distress in Poland, to achieve a settlement in southern Africa, to restore independence to Afghanistan, to end the occupation of Kampuchea, and to halt Soviet and Cuban-supported subversion in Central America. In each instance, we have conveyed our views forcefully to the Soviets in an attempt to remove the obstacles that Soviet conduct puts in the way of resolving these problems.

"Last year, for example, Ambassador Hartman conducted a round of exploratory talks on Afghanistan between the United States and Soviet officials in Moscow. Any solution to the Afghanistan problem must meet four requirements: Complete withdrawal of Soviet forces, restoration of Afghanistan's independent and nonaligned status, formation of a government acceptable to the Afghan people, and honorable return of the refugees. This is not the view of the United States alone. These principles underlie the discussions now underway under the auspices of the U.N. Secretary General, which we support.

"On southern African problems, Assistant Secretary Crocker has held a number of detailed exchanges with his Soviet counterpart. Southern Africa has been a point of tension and periodic friction between the United States and the Soviet Union for many years. We want to see tensions in the area reduced. But this more peaceful future will not be achieved unless all parties interested in the region show restraint, external military forces are withdrawn, and Namibia is permitted to achieve independence. If the Soviets are at all concerned with the interests of Africans, they should have an equal interest in achieving these objectives.

"As in our arms control negotiations, we have made it absolutely clear to the Soviets in these discussions that we are not interested in cosmetic solutions. We are interested in solving problems fundamental to maintenance of the international order.

"It is also our view that Soviet participation in international efforts to resolve regional conflicts, in southern Africa or the Middle East, for example, depends on Soviet conduct. If the Soviets seek to benefit from tension and support those who promote disorder, they can hardly expect them to act responsibility merely because they gain a role. At the same time, we have also made it clear that we will not exploit, and in fact, are prepared to respond positively to Soviet restraint. The decision in each case is theirs.

“The final part of our agenda with the Soviets comprises economic and other bilateral relations. In our dialog, we have spelled out our view of these matters in a candid and forthright way. As we see it, economic transactions can confer important strategic benefits, and we must be mindful of the implications for our security. Therefore, as I have already indicated, we believe economic relations with the East deserve more careful scrutiny than in the past. But our policy is not one of economic warfare against the U.S.S.R. East-West trade in non-strategic areas, in the words of the NATO communique ‘conducted on the basis of commercially sound terms and mutual advantage, that avoids preferential treatment of the Soviet Union, contributes to constructive East-West relations.’

“Despite the strains of the past few years in our overall relationship, we have maintained the key elements in the structure for bilateral trade. We have recently agreed with the U.S.S.R. to extend our bilateral fisheries agreement for 1 year and have begun to negotiate a new long-term United States-Soviet grain agreement. Our grain sales are on commercial terms and are not made with Government-supported credits or guarantees of any kind.

“As for contacts between people, we have cut back on largely symbolic exchanges but maintain a framework of cooperation in scientific, technical, and humanitarian fields. A major consideration as we pursue such exchanges must be reciprocity. If the Soviet Union is to enjoy virtually unlimited opportunities for access to our free society, U.S. access to Soviet society must increase. We have made progress toward gaining Soviet acceptance of this principle, as is indicated by the airing in Moscow this past weekend of an interview with Deputy Secretary Ken Dam.

“Eight bilateral cooperative agreements are now in effect, and exchanges between the Academies of Science continue, as do exchanges of young scholars and Fulbright fellows. ‘America Illustrated’ magazine continues to be distributed in the Soviet Union in return for distribution here of ‘Soviet Life,’ in spite of the absence of a cultural exchanges agreement. Toward the private sector, we have maintained an attitude of neither encouraging nor discouraging exchanges, and a steady flow of tourists and conference participants goes on in both directions. The number of U.S. news bureaus in Moscow has actually increased in the last year.” (United States-Soviet Relations: Hearings Before the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, Ninety-Eighth Congress, First Session, June 15 and 16, 1983, Part 1, pages 1, 3–4, 11–16)

159. Memorandum of Conversation¹

Washington, June 15, 1983, 4:50–5:50 p.m.

SUBJECT

US-Soviet Relations

PARTICIPANTS

The President, Vice President Bush, Counselor Meese, Chief of Staff to the President Baker, Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs Clark, Secretary of State Shultz, Secretary of Defense Weinberger, Deputy Director of Intelligence McMahon, Deputy Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs McFarlane

BACKGROUND: The purpose of the meeting was for the attendees to receive a status report on the state of US-Soviet relations as expressed in the dialogue undertaken at the President's instruction by the Secretary of State in February 1983. There have been approximately ten meetings between the Secretary and Ambassador Dobrynin which have been focussed upon four generic areas: Human Rights; Regional Issues; Arms Control; and Bilateral Issues.²

The Secretary of State opened with a summation of the President's thinking for why the initiative had been authorized originally. He referred to the President's success in establishing a solid beginning toward the restoration of our military strength. More recently, Williamsburg³ had

The meeting took place in the Treaty Room of the residence at the White House. No drafting information appears on the memorandum. The memorandum of conversation is also in Foreign Relations, 1981–1988, vol. IV, Soviet Union, January 1983–March 1985, Document 62. Under a June 14 briefing memorandum, Burt sent Shultz talking points for the meeting. (Reagan Library, George Shultz Papers, Miscellaneous Papers Dealing With the Soviets (05/26/1983–12/19/1983); NLR–775–20–31–2–3) In his personal diary for June 15, the President described the meeting, noting that Shultz was “meeting with Dobrynin & Gromyko and wanted to check with us on subject matter & positions. We were all in agreement that we be firm, willing to hold out a hand at same time let them know we d--n well want them to stay away from Central America.” (Brinkley, ed., The Reagan Diaries, vol. I, January 1981–October 1985, p. 237)

² Records of these meetings are in Foreign Relations, 1981–1988, vol. IV, Soviet Union, January 1983–March 1985, Documents 9, 10, and 11. Shultz further elaborated upon these four areas in a March 3 memorandum to the President (see ibid., Document 13). He also discussed them during his testimony before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee the morning of June 15; see Document 158.

³ The Williamsburg summit was held May 28–30. For the text of the President's May 28 statement, his May 28 remarks, a joint statement read by Shultz on May 29, Shultz's May 29 news briefing, the President's May 29 news briefing, the “Declaration on Economic Recovery” read by the President on May 30, Shultz's May 30 news briefing, the President's May 30 news briefing, his May 30 dinner toast, and his May 31 interview, see Department of State Bulletin, July 1983, pp. 3–22. presented solid evidence of greatly improved allied cohesion which would contribute significantly to Soviet perceptions of Western strength in any negotiation we might undertake.

The Secretary stated that the President's instructions had been to explore Soviet responsiveness to our interests in each of the four general areas. These discussions were to take place at the Ambassadorial level and based upon the results a decision could be taken as to whether or not the dialogue should be elevated to the Foreign Minister level with a view ultimately toward a meeting between the Heads of State.

STATUS REPORT: The Secretary of State then went into the results thus far achieved in each of the four generic areas.

Human Rights. There appears to be some promise of progress in the human rights area as exemplified by the release of Lydia Vashchenko.⁴ The other members of her family have applied for their visas. The other family (Chymkhalov) has experienced difficulty in making their application. In short, while the process seems to be in motion all except Lydia remain in the Soviet Union.

The Secretary noted the possible promise of a channel established by Ambassador Kampelman with his KGB counterpart in the Soviet delegation at the CSCE-Madrid. While a solid agenda had been discussed no tangible results have thus far been achieved however. Time will tell.

Regional Issues. The Secretary of State said that with regard to discussions on Afghanistan, Poland and Central America, essentially nothing had been achieved. He noted that the Soviets had expressed an interest in discussing the Middle East. He had intentionally restricted references to the Middle East to only the most summary comments.

Arms Control. The Secretary noted that we have had mixed results in discussions on arms control. Today he had heard that the Soviets had made a somewhat encouraging statement in response to the President's recent START announcement.⁵ With regard to INF, we have thus far not been able to make progress. Concerning MBFR, we have had an apparent "nibble." Finally, concerning confidence building measures (CBMs)

⁴ See footnote 4, Document 135.

⁵ Reference is to the President's June 8 remarks on START, made from the Rose Garden at the White House. He announced that he had "directed new steps toward progress in achieving real arms reductions at the START negotiations," including increased flexibility for U.S. negotiators and an adjustment of the U.S. "position on deployed ballistic missiles by relaxing our current proposal for an 850 deployed ballistic missile limit." (Public Papers: Reagan, 1983, Book I, pp. 832, 833)

the Soviets appear to have some interest in two of the four proposals we had made.⁶

Bilateral Issues. In this area the Secretary said the only initiative proposed by either side had been our offer for negotiation of a new long-term grain agreement (LTA).⁷ He noted that the Soviets viewed this proposal as serving our interests and not theirs. As a consequence it had a rather ambiguous standing.

The Secretary then went on to describe the format for the sessions with Dobrynin. These normally included two phases: the first in which staff specialists contributed to particular issues on the agenda, (e.g., Ambassador Nitze on INF); followed by a private one-on-one session between the Secretary and Ambassador Dobrynin.

Before going on to propose an agenda for the forthcoming meeting on Saturday, June 18, he asked if anyone had any comments.⁸

Deputy Director McMahon noted that Chernenko's speech at the CPSU Central Committee Meeting in support of Andropov was an indicator of the latter's strength.⁹

The next meeting. The Secretary then proposed that the forthcoming meeting follow the same format as before with the agenda this time to include a discussion of our recent initiative at MBFR (Ambassador Abramowitz to attend) and the President's recent proposal for START (Ambassador Rowny to attend for this item). The Secretary of State said he would also describe the Williamsburg Conference—the point to be made, that of Allied solidarity. In addition to these subjects, the Secretary proposed going once more into each of the four generic areas. With regard to bilateral relations, the Secretary proposed that he be authorized to express US willingness to open talks toward the establishment of a Soviet Consulate in New York City and a US Consulate in Kiev. In addition, he proposed that he be authorized to express our willingness to open talks devoted to the negotiation of a new cultural agreement. The Secretary went on to explain that the net benefit from any such agreements would accrue to the United States. Specifically, with respect to the proposed consulates the Secretary noted that the improved intelligence accruing to the Soviets from a New York City consulate would not add that much to the capability they already enjoy through the United Nations presence. On the other hand, a window for the United States in Kiev would provide us a substantial improvement in our collection capability.

With regard to the cultural agreement, the Secretary noted at the moment the Soviets were free to send as many cultural representatives to this country as they wished since these are arranged through private sources and the government now has no real control over them. He noted that a treaty would give us an instrument for seeking greater reciprocity in this area and would also legitimize a higher flow of cultural visits from West to East.

The Secretary then noted that with regard to regional issues the situation had worsened in Central America and that this might be a outgrowth of a flaw in the marker we had earlier laid down to the Russians. Specifically, our statement that we would find the introduction of high-performance aircraft or Cuban combat units “unacceptable” may have implied that all actions other than these would be tolerated. The Secretary stated that we should clarify this.

Judge Clark noted that in the early 70’s when the Soviets commenced submarine operations out of Cienfuegos, Cuba, the Administration had characterized this as “an unfriendly act.”¹⁰ Ultimately this had led to the termination of these operations. He recommended that the Secretary treat current Soviet activities in Central America in the same fashion—that is, that their activities which contribute to unrest generally (not just the introduction of modern weapons and combat units) will be unacceptable. The President approved this proposal.

The Secretary then raised the matter of how any mention of a summit ought to be treated. He reiterated existing Administration policy with regard to summits: that is, that we are not opposed in principle however they would need to be well prepared in advance and hold the promise of significant accomplishment.

Secretary Weinberger noted the inconsistency which would be represented by our conducting discussions of the possibility of a ¹⁰ Reference is to Soviet activity at Cienfuegos Bay, Cuba. In September 1970, a reconnaissance plane photographed construction that suggested that the Soviet Union was constructing a naval facility, which went against the 1962 understanding that the Soviets would not base offensive weapons in Cuba. Documentation on the incident is in Foreign Relations, 1969–1976, vol. XIII, Soviet Union, October 1970–October 1971 and Foreign Relations, 1969–1976, vol. summit while the Soviets remained in Afghanistan, Poland and Central America.

This subject was not conclusively resolved.

At this point the meeting evolved into round-table remarks which were basically supportive of the Secretary proceeding according to the format he had proposed. The Vice President noted in particular the value of the private meeting after the larger set piece agenda had been disposed of. He believed that this private session held the most promise for getting results.

As the participants rose to leave, the Secretary of State asked whether he should bring Ambassador Rowny back to participate in Saturday's meeting. The President agreed that he should.

The Secretary also asked, "what about the other items?" The President answered go ahead.

Conclusions: After the meeting it was confirmed that the President approved:

- The convening of a meeting by the Secretary of State with Ambassador Dobrynin on Saturday, June 18.
- That this meeting should be conducted according to the same format as meetings of the past.
- That the Secretary should summarize important issues and proposals put forth by our side since the last meeting (e.g., START proposal and the results of Williamsburg).
- He should discuss human rights, arms control, regional issues and bilateral issues.
- That in discussing the situation in Central America, the Secretary should protest the recent Soviet escalation of military deliveries to Nicaragua and state that we consider these actions and other Soviet measures of support to Nicaragua for the export of revolution to neighboring countries to be unfriendly actions which must cease.
- That Ambassador Rowny and Ambassador Abramowitz should return to participate in the arms control portion.
- With regard to bilateral issues the Secretary was authorized to propose that the U.S. and the Soviet Union open talks devoted to the conclusion of agreements for the establishment of consulates in New York City and Kiev; and for the conduct of cultural exchanges between the two countries.

There were no conclusions reached with regard to:

- Any future possibilities of a summit meeting, or
- Travel by the Secretary of State to Moscow for meetings with Soviet officials.

160. Editorial Note

On June 21, 1983, President Ronald Reagan met with Spanish Prime Minister Felipe Gonzalez in the Cabinet Room at the White House at 11:45 a.m. According to the memorandum of conversation, in addition to the President, Vice President George H.W. Bush, Secretary of State George Shultz, Secretary of the Treasury Donald Regan, Secretary of Commerce Malcom Baldrige, President's Assistant for National Security Affairs William Clark, President's Deputy Assistant for National Security Affairs Robert McFarlane, Deputy Secretary of State Kenneth Dam, Deputy Secretary of Defense William Thayer, Assistant Secretary of State for European Affairs Richard Burt, and National Security Council staff members Charles Tyson and Peter Sommer attended the meeting.

After Reagan's opening remarks, Gonzalez made a statement in which, among other things, he noted the desirability of close Spanish-U.S. ties, and underscored "Spain's historic and cultural links" to the countries of Latin America. According to the memorandum of conversation: "The President praised Gonzalez' remarks, noting he found no areas of disagreement. He said he had long held a dream of improving our relations with our southern neighbors. Past Presidents had proposed the Good Neighbor policy and the Alliance for Progress, but Americans on a whole had remained insensitive to the weight of our size and past history in the region. Early in his Administration, added the President, he had traveled to South and Central America to hear their ideas first hand. There is much common ground. We worship the same God, share the same heritage, and both our forebearers largely came from Europe to these great unexplored continents. The President underlined that he has introduced in Congress the CBI legislation, which is aimed at opening investment opportunities, economic growth, and most importantly job opportunities for the Central American countries and the Caribbean Island nations. We acknowledge, he continued, that there is a wide disparity in the region between those enmeshed in poverty and the more fortunate. This, we recognize, makes many countries vulnerable to revolution.

"Turning to El Salvador the President noted that this small country recently overthrew 50 years of military rule. It now has a democratically elected government, chosen by the people. Guerrilla forces intent on challenging the elected government tried to prevent the election. These non-democratic forces, guided and supplied by the Soviet Union—by way of Cuba and Nicaragua—are seeking a communist dictatorship. The President recalled that the stories he heard from some election observers were astounding and heart rendering. Many of the El Salvadoran people walked many miles to vote. Some waited in lines for 10 hours. There was even a woman—wounded by guerrillas—who refused to seek medical treatment until she voted. People chanted at the visiting press: ‘tell the truth!’ There was an 80 percent voter turn-out. It has been a long time, added the President, since the U.S. has had such a large turn-out. The El Salvador government plans on holding another election before this year is out. We support a political solution. Three-quarters of our aid is economic. El Salvador, continued the President, has made great strides in land distribution. But their efforts also require a security shield. We only have 55 military advisors in country. In emphasizing that he had no plans to send combat troops, he emphasized that our advisors are helping to train the El Salvadoran military to protect a democratic government.

“The President then turned to Nicaragua and what he called its failed revolution. Immediately following the revolution, my predecessor, he said, provided aid to the new government. But the Junta quickly began abusing individual rights, restricted freedoms, and refused to hold early elections. Then Soviet and Cuban equipment came pouring in. Its purpose, the President underlined, was to overthrow the elected government of El Salvador. The Contras are loyal Nicaraguans who participated in the original revolution, but were ousted by the communist elements. Now they strive, he added, to return Nicaragua to the origins of the revolution, i.e., democracy. He said many in Europe do not have a true understanding of the situation in Central America. The Soviet aim is to spread communism throughout Central America and undermine developing democracies in such countries as Costa Rica—which does not even have an army—and Honduras. We recognize Spain’s historic interest—these links can help all of us overcome the problems. As I have repeatedly said, continued the President, the U.S. has no intention of sending troops. Nor, he added, had the Salvadoran government asked for them. President Magana confirmed this to the press in Washington last week. Gunboat diplomacy is not the answer, but we do, he underscored, need to help the El Salvadoran government provide the shield to protect their emerging democratic institutions and reforms.

“In concluding, the President apologized for making a speech and said that discussions could continue over lunch.” (Reagan Library, Executive Secretariat, NSC Subject File, Memorandums of Conversation—President Reagan (06/23/1983–07/25/1983))

In his personal diary entry for June 21, the President described Gonzalez as “sharp, a bright, personable, young moderate & pragmatic socialist. I think we hit it off pretty good which was what he wanted. I did lecture him a little on Central Am.” (Brinkley, ed., The Reagan Diaries, volume I, January 1981–October 1985, page 239)

Washington, undated

GOALS AND PRIORITIES

In your memorandum to Cap and me on June 7,² you asked us to identify the priority objectives in foreign policy on which we should concentrate our energies over the next 18 months, with special emphasis on your activity and involvement. This paper lists these priorities and lays out our strategy for pursuing them.

As your memorandum said, we have achieved a great deal in the first half of this Presidential term. In the second half of the term, however, we will need to start drawing dividends from our efforts. The restoration of our military strength, our firmness with the Soviets, the greater unity of the allies, and the promising initiatives we have launched in many areas are a solid foundation from which we can now move forward. The next six months—before the full Presidential campaign begins—are particularly important.

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

Our foreign policy priorities through the remainder of this term, it seems to me, are the following:

—We must maintain allied cohesion through the difficult period of INF deployment. This will require intensive Presidential contacts with key allied leaders (including Japan); public diplomacy to neutralize the expected sharp Soviet reaction to our deployment; and efforts to ensure that the Soviets, and not we, are blamed if negotiations fail.

—We should use our new leverage with the Soviets to explore the possibilities of constructive dialogue aiming at visible progress on our own agenda, including arms control. The question of a summit should be considered in terms of whether it is a way to make the Soviets face up to the long-term direction of our relationship and whether it is an effective way to demonstrate to our public and our allies that we are not to blame for any tensions.

—In the Middle East, we continue to seek the removal of all foreign forces from Lebanon, and we should seek over the next 18 months to shape conditions in the area that will make possible an Arab-Israeli negotiation on the basis of your September 1 initiative. Syria is the key country blocking progress on both, and we need to consider what incentives and penalties we can bring to bear on Syria.

—In Central America, your personal leadership will be essential for maintaining public and Congressional support for what must be done. Success will depend on sustaining the highest possible levels of military and economic assistance. At the same time, we should have a diplomatic agenda and strategy in order to maintain political support in the region and at home.

—Restoring America's position in Asia, a decade after Vietnam, can be one of this Administration's lasting achievements. Our goal for the near-term future is to integrate Japan even more fully into the management of the free world global system, building on the achievement of Williamsburg. Consolidating our strategic relationship with China will block the Soviets' recent attempts at Sino-Soviet rapprochement.

—In Southern Africa, we have a chance to get Cuban troops out of Angola, together with an agreement on independence for Namibia. It is essential to maintain the linkage between the two. Everything depends on perception of our staying power.

ANALYSIS

Success or failure in any one of these areas will affect our success or failure in the others. Our success in holding the democracies together obviously will affect our negotiations with the Soviets, and vice versa. Success in the Middle East would affect our Alliance relationships; a setback in Central America would weaken us in all areas. Bearing in mind these interrelationships, let me discuss each of the priority areas in turn.

The Democracies and INF

The electoral victories of Thatcher, Kohl, and Nakasone³ are reflections of a strengthened resolve among our democratic allies, and the Williamsburg Summit showed an impressive unity among free world nations. Nevertheless, we are still basically dealing with an uncertain and dispirited Europe, as reflected in the deep polarization in some societies (particularly West Germany). Therefore, it will be no easy task to help these leaders manage through this critical year. Plans have been announced for very large and possibly violent “peace” demonstrations this fall. This will put unprecedented strain on allied solidarity and on West Germany’s political cohesion. The Soviets will try to lure wavering allies into seeking a “delay” of INF deployments while negotiations continue, threatening new missile deployments and an increase in tensions if NATO deployments go forward.

Our strategy for maintaining allied unity in support of deployment will require, first of all, continual consultation at the highest level, drawing heavily on your close personal relationship with the key leaders. Bilateral and perhaps multilateral meetings with key leaders may well be essential as the December date of deployment approaches (particularly with the heads of government of the three initial basing countries: FRG, UK, and Italy). You will need to stay in constant touch with all of them. Next year’s UK-hosted Economic Summit will undoubtedly be an important occasion for reaffirming allied cohesion and our willingness to negotiate with the Soviets on INF.⁴

The second key component of our strategy will be public diplomacy. A bellicose posture is risky for the Soviets, since it could forfeit much of what they have gained through detente in Europe; we should be prepared to exploit it. As the Soviets prepare to stir up tensions to intimidate the allies, our job is to prepare the allies psychologically so they are not shaken by these pressures, and to ensure that European publics place the blame squarely on the Soviets for whatever tensions arise.

Related to this is the third component: our negotiating strategy toward the Soviets on INF. The allies will want reassurance that we have negotiated in good faith and that the blame for failure rests on the Soviets. This may require, down the road, some agile maneuvering and tactical flexibility, at least in presentation. Whether or not we make any further adjustments in our negotiating position, a major Presidential speech on arms control may be helpful at the appropriate moment.

A possible US-Soviet summit could come after the Soviets have given up hope of delaying the start of INF deployments. That timing would put you in the best position to move the dialogue to your agenda. Any such summit, in any case, should probably also be preceded by your meeting with at least Thatcher, Kohl, Mitterrand, and the Italians in Europe.

⁴ Scheduled to take place in London, June 7–9, 1984.

A Dialogue with the Soviets

Over the next 18 months, we are sure to come under increasing pressure at home and abroad to do more to improve Soviet-American relations and in particular to hold a summit meeting between you and Andropov.

At a minimum a summit could help demonstrate to our public and our allies that we are pursuing every avenue of possible progress, and that if no progress results, the Soviets are to blame. However, while the shaping of public attitudes is important, our real starting point in assessing a possible summit should be whether it contributes to attaining our policy goals.

Looking to the next year and a half we can distinguish between our minimum objectives in US-Soviet relations and a series of more ambitious but still reasonable goals:

—Regional conflicts: at a minimum, our aim is no new Soviet gain or critical US setback owing to Soviet sponsorship; if possible, a Soviet retreat from a major geopolitical position (e.g., Angola, Nicaragua).

—Arms talks: at a minimum, no uncompensated sacrifice of key Western weapon systems; if possible, a breakthrough agreement on acceptable principles.

—Human rights: at a minimum, sustaining unified Western pressures for improved Soviet performance; if possible, a major dissident release or emigration increase.

Our record to date gives reason for confidence that all the minimum goals are attainable. By the standards of the 70's this will represent a real achievement. It will require vigilance and effort, especially to sustain public support at critical junctures.

What is less certain is whether meeting our minimum goals is sufficient for sustaining the tougher, more realistic policies this Administration has introduced. I believe that putting the superpower relationship on a more satisfactory footing for the long term may depend in part on whether we can move beyond minimum goals in the short term. If not, our policies may be vulnerable to charges of a poor return on our investment (and allowed to unravel, as happened to even the Nixon-Ford policies under Carter). Particularly if the Soviets react to our INF deployments by increasing tensions, the payoff for our firm approach may be still further questioned.

Protecting our minimum goals over the rest of the decade may depend, in short, on making a serious effort to attain at least some of our more ambitious objectives. For this purpose, the leverage we have developed over the past two years—especially our military strength as leverage in the arms talks, and the public consensus that gives all our policies credibility—will be invaluable. However, it is likely that we will have to give increasing attention, as in any negotiation, to defining acceptable adjustments in the two sides' positions. And we will have to find ways of bringing these issues to a decision point for the Soviets.

My judgment is that a summit may prove a useful device for focusing Soviet attention on the longer-term direction of our relationship. While it cannot by itself substitute for leverage developed in other ways, it may help us to put this leverage to the test.

The prime worry in connection with a prospective summit is how to ensure public understanding of an event which might well produce only limited results or no results at all. I believe this problem will be manageable, especially as your political position continues to strengthen.

If the Soviets prove utterly inflexible and we end up having to tough out the next 18 months without any improvement in US-Soviet relations, we will not necessarily be any worse off whether or not a summit has taken place. In either case, we will face the real job of showing that the Soviets are to blame. Avoiding a summit will not free us of this task.

The problem of public expectations applies not just to a summit that does not produce results but perhaps even more to one that does. You will have to make a major effort to control expectations generated by whatever agreements we are able to achieve. We will need to make clear—within the government, in public, and to the Soviets—that we are capable of sustaining a competitive posture even if the Soviets try to use agreement in one area as a kind of safety valve. To put Soviet-American relations on this secure footing for the long term may be as challenging as restoring our competitive posture in the first place.

On balance, I believe you would enter a summit in a relatively strong position. Precisely because you will not need the meeting to attain your minimum goals, you should be able to shift the negotiating burden to the Soviets. But even if a summit does not produce major progress, as is quite possible, it could have some tangible benefits. The preparations are likely to have a constraining effect on Soviet conduct, and the follow-up to a summit could be quite productive if it became clear to the Soviets that the fact of holding it had strengthened your hand.

Making a decision in principle, of course, would still leave many issues unresolved—timing, preparations, content, and (perhaps crucially) how to protect against the possibility of failure. My tentative view is that a meeting relatively early next year might be desirable, especially to help keep the INF confrontation within bounds. If Andropov comes to the UN General Assembly in the fall, we will face a different set of considerations, which must be carefully examined. These questions will require thorough consideration over the rest of this summer, so that we can have in place by the fall a plan that can be well insulated against the coming Presidential campaign season. I will be sending you further analyses of these questions in the next several weeks.

Middle East

In the Middle East over the next 18 months, we have two specific objectives: getting Syria to withdraw from Lebanon, and creating conditions that will eventually make it possible to start an Arab-Israeli negotiation in accordance with your September 1 initiative. Our broader objectives are to maintain American dominance of Middle East diplomacy and reduce the Soviet role in the area by demonstrating to the Arabs that if they want progress they must come to us.

To achieve these objectives, it will be essential to maintain a relationship with Israel that is no less solid than now. As we see currently in Lebanon, the perception of Israeli weakness is only an encouragement to Arab radicals. In many parts of the world there are opportunities for useful US-Israeli geopolitical cooperation. At this point it is the Arabs, not the Israelis, who bear the onus for blocking our diplomacy on both Lebanon and the peace process. For all these reasons, any policy shift that required us to bring massive pressure on Israel would be futile and counterproductive.

In Lebanon, our strategy is to support and strengthen Gemayel's government and the Lebanese Armed Forces; to mobilize moderate Arab pressures on Syria; to open our own dialogue with Syria; and to stay in close consultation with Israel to ensure that Israeli moves, such as a partial unilateral withdrawal, are coordinated with us and are part of an agreed strategy. It will also be essential to demonstrate to the Syrians and Soviets the risks of non-withdrawal. We have few positive incentives to offer Syria; we should explore whatever pressure points on Syria are available.

Lebanon could at any time produce a crisis, for which we should be prepared. If a crisis erupts from a Syrian-Israeli clash, our strategy will have to be to prevent Soviet involvement and ensure an outcome that deflates the present self-confidence and blocking influence of the Syrians.

Your meetings with Gemayel and Begin in July will be key occasions for concerting strategy.⁵ Continuing Presidential exchanges with all leaders of the area, particularly Fahd, will be essential. White House involvement will also be crucial in Congressional consultations on aid for Lebanon and on the role of the MNF.

On the peace process, there is no possibility of King Hussein's stepping forward in the near future. The present Syrian self-confidence and perceived Israeli weakness in Lebanon are undercutting the peace process, since the result is to embolden radicals and cow the Arab moderates. West Bankers have increasing reason to be disillusioned with the PLO, which blocked a West Bank negotiation and which is now dominated by Syria. Nevertheless, something will probably have to happen to deflate or wear down the Syrians before any moderates will step forward (either Hussein or the West Bankers or both together).

Our strategy in the next 18 months should be to keep the September 1 initiative alive while we try to shape the conditions in the area so that progress will be possible at some future point. If you chose to address the UN General Assembly in the fall, it would be a natural forum for reiterating your commitment.⁶ A future trip by me to the area would carry the same message. A success in Lebanon should be parlayed into a renewed push on the peace process, which could well involve a Presidential statement.

In the meantime we might consider an initiative with the Israelis to modify their occupation policies in the West Bank and Gaza to improve civil liberties and economic opportunities for the Palestinians. This will have to be sought through quiet diplomacy with the Israelis, mainly Moshe Arens. In the longer run, success here could have a political payoff: It could enhance US credibility with moderate Arabs, and it could help nurture a creditable indigenous leadership in the West Bank and Gaza which may be willing to participate with King Hussein in a negotiation in accordance with the September 1 initiative.

The present demoralization of the Begin government suggests that major political changes may occur in Israel in the next 18 months. This too could create new prospects for the peace process.

In the meantime, we should deliberately frustrate all diplomatic efforts contrary to ours—whether by the UN, the Europeans, the Soviets, or any other trying to be “helpful”—in order to prove that anyone who wants progress has to come to us. Especially if our own diplomacy seems stalemated, it is in our interest to stick to our present course of demonstrating over and over again that the Soviets can deliver nothing.

Central America

Central America is our point of greatest vulnerability over the next 18 months. Our response to the Communist threat in Central America must cover two fronts: developments within the region, which promise to be difficult but probably not decisive; and reactions here at home, which can undermine our effectiveness, particularly if our tenuous bipartisan support breaks down.

The four elements of your speech to the Joint Session of Congress (democratization, economic development, an active regional diplomacy, and security assistance) are sound.⁷ We have made substantial progress over the last two years, with elections and military training in El Salvador and growing pressure on the Sandinistas in Nicaragua. But this has not yet turned the tide. The Communists and their allies still think they can outlast us. I believe our policy will work over the next two to four years if we stick to it and bolster the various components (e.g., economic and military assistance) as the situation evolves. The alternatives—either more direct US military involvement or a pulling back from our involvement—will be either not feasible or directly contrary to our national interest. The problem is that the lack of faster progress will increase pressures here at home for a policy shift.

⁷ Printed as Document 152.

Your personal involvement will therefore be critical in providing continuing leadership with the American public and the Congress. Your Joint Session speech had a major impact and helped convey the seriousness of the threat. Success will require that we be able to provide military assistance on a more certain basis than in the past. At the same time, we must still be seen as working seriously for a political solution consistent with our democratic values and with the interests of other countries in the region. This means continuing to give prominence to our own diplomatic activities, including the Stone mission and support for regional peacekeeping. This will be especially necessary if the Cubans and Soviets raise the ante militarily, forcing us to help our neighbors to further strengthen their defenses.

Two symbolic steps are available to hold the political high ground and strengthen bipartisan support. You could take advantage of CBI passage to hold a major ceremony including both government and private sector representatives from Central America and the Caribbean (perhaps outside the United States—in Kingston or Santo Domingo). You could also take advantage of the passage of legislation connected with your Democracy Program to reemphasize your commitment to democratic values in the hemisphere.⁸

To lessen the exclusive focus on controversial Central America, this could be supplemented by your greater personal involvement on issues affecting South America and Mexico. For example, a major disaster relief package to help deal with the devastation wrought on the West Coast of South America by “El Nino”⁹ could be publicized as help to “democracies in trouble” and make more credible our defense of democracy in Central America. Your August meeting with the Mexican President will also be important in this regard.¹⁰

Asia

A decade after Vietnam, we are in the process of reestablishing America’s position in Asia. This may well be one of your Administration’s major lasting achievements.

The economies of free Asia—particularly Japan, Korea and ASEAN—will be growing rapidly in the coming decade and playing an even greater role in the global economic system. The political importance of the region—as a counterweight to the Soviets, as a moderating influence in the Third World—will also grow. These important and reliable friends will merit Presidential attention.

The Japanese-American partnership has never been stronger. Your personal relationship with Nakasone is a key element of this. Our closer collaboration in the political and security fields is all the more remarkable against the background of our recent economic disputes, and in fact will provide the framework and impetus for resolving these economic disputes satisfactorily. We have the near-term objective of integrating Japan more fully into the management of the free world global system. This means building on the success of Williamsburg, at which Japan joined in the security declaration.¹¹ The importance of Japan’s role in the INF issue is now clear: It gives us important support and leverage against the Soviets and strengthens our hand with our European allies.

Consolidating our strategic relationship with China is also an important near-term priority. We have certainly gone as far as we can go with Beijing over Taiwan, but China’s global and regional importance is such that it is advantageous to maintain the relationship on an even keel. Rightly or wrongly, most Americans see the China opening since 1971 as an improvement in the US strategic position. Chinese rhetoric and behavior over bilateral questions are often unhelpful, but Chinese policy on most international issues is anti-Soviet and therefore parallel to ours—which is the real basis for our relationship.

The decisions you have already made to ease technology transfer should help consolidate these ties, provided that implementation produces some concrete improvements for the Chinese.¹² A visit to this country by Premier Zhao Ziyang in the next 18 months would be seen as a coup: It would demonstrate your effective management of China policy and would demonstrate also that the Soviets have not succeeded in weakening the US-China strategic relationship. It would also make it appropriate for you to visit China if and when you choose.

Southern Africa

Another priority objective for the next 18 months is Cuban troop withdrawal from Angola, in connection with an agreement on independence for Namibia. Besides being a success for our Soviet policy, this major achievement would strengthen the African and domestic flanks of our policy of constructive engagement with South Africa. It would thereby facilitate progress toward two other goals: encouraging South Africa as it makes gradual but practical changes in its apartheid policy, and encouraging dialogue and mutual restraint between South Africa and its neighbors.

A Presidential speech to the UN General Assembly would be an occasion to reiterate our objectives, but other forms of direct involvement by you are also likely to be required at the later stages of the process.

Our present strategy of linking Angola and Namibia is the right way to pursue our interests even if it does not produce immediate results. Everything depends on perception of our staying power; pressures will accelerate on whichever side seems most likely to yield. If we appear locked in concrete on this linkage—and as your reelection seems more and more likely—significant movement in our direction could occur in 1984.

If the Angolans continue to be interested in a dialogue with us but are unable to summon the political will to send the Cubans home, our response will depend on what we see as the main reason for their hesitation. If the reason is Cuban or Soviet pressures, we must maintain

¹² During his trip to China in June 1981, Haig announced that the United States would relax controls on high technology and weapons sales to China. During his June 16 news conference, the President explained that “all we have done is—with the People’s Republic of China, we’ve wanted—and I’ve said for a long time—to improve relations with them, move them to the same status of many other countries and not necessarily military allies of ours, in making certain technology and defensive weapons available to them.” (Public Papers: Reagan, 1981, Book I, p. 524) During his May 1983 trip to China, Baldrige indicated that the United States would raise the level of technology transfers as a result of Presidential directives to be implemented over the next several weeks. (Jonathan Broder, “New rules mean more high-tech data for China: Baldrige,” Chicago Tribune, pp. E9, E12, and Amanda Bennett, “Baldrige Tells China That U.S. Will Ease Restraints on High-Technology Exports,” Wall Street Journal, p. 34; both May 26, 1983)

our counterpressures. If the reason is continued fear of the threat from Savimbi and UNITA, we should work closely with Savimbi to explore how this can be exploited through a UNITA–MPLA negotiation. Depending on how close we felt the Angolans were to a decision, we might consider a high-level mission (by me or Ken Dam) to the Front Line States, including a stop in Luanda. This would provide both an opportunity for high-pressure US diplomacy and a token of the relationship with us that would be possible if Angola shifted away from reliance on the USSR and Cuba.

If the obstacle turns out to be South African reluctance to accept an Angolan proposal we think is reasonable, we could dangle the prospect of [a] P.W. Botha visit to Washington. Given the political sensitivities here, a visit would probably be best in the context of final agreement on a Namibia solution coupled with US encouragement of further internal reforms. Your role will be crucial in building support at home for a Namibia settlement.

If no breakthrough seems possible on Angola/Namibia in the next 18 months, our task would become one of perseverance and damage-limitation. We would seek to preserve the framework of regional negotiations and shore up allied unity in the Contact Group. But we would shift our ground somewhat, from an emphasis on regional negotiations to a vigorous bilateral diplomacy aimed at holding down the level of violence in the region. This would obviously require maintaining our influence with South Africa, while encouraging it to negotiate with its neighbors: The trade-off would be black African restrictions on ANC guerrilla activities against South Africa in exchange for South African military restraint. Maintaining our relations with black Africa would probably require that we remain willing to speak out against internal South African transgressions not related to security.

Other Issues

In addition to the above high-priority objectives, there is another issue which may be of basic importance over the next 18 months.

This is the Third World debt problem, which still has the potential to produce a financial crisis in the next year or two. Our major objective here is to avoid a default by any of the large LDC debtors. This requires working patiently with Mexico, Brazil, and Argentina in particular and extending new financing as necessary over the next 18 months until global recovery begins to pull them out of danger. This will be a delicate operation, particularly in Argentina and Brazil where internal political pressures might produce leaders willing to defy us and declare default. On our side, we face two significant dangers: first, the impact on our banks (which the Federal Reserve could move quickly to counter); and second, the risk that the costs of default for these large-market countries would, after a painful transition, prove bearable, thus tempting emulation by many other countries. (If a smaller-market country is the first to default, the penalties could be made unbearably heavy and prolonged—virtually paralyzing their trade—to set an example.) Unless our own recovery stalls or we lose the IMF bill in the Congress,¹³ we should be able to balance these delicate requirements. Your personal involvement may be needed in the final Congressional push on the IMF bill.

¹³ Reference is to pending legislation that would increase the U.S. contribution to the International Monetary Fund. The Senate version of the bill (S. 695) was reported by the Foreign Relations Committee on March 24 and the Banking Committee on May 16. The full Senate approved the bill on June 8. The House Banking Committee reported its version (H.R. 2957), which included reauthorization of the Export-Import Bank and additional funding for the multilateral development banks, on May 16. The full House would approve the bill on August 3. However, the legislation remained stalled for 3 months due to a variety of issues, including House Banking Chair Fernand St. Germain's (D-Rhode Island) decision to hold up conference until Congress had passed a housing authorization. Eventually, the housing authorization and the IMF increase were combined and attached to the supplemental appropriations bill for FY 1984 (H.R. 3959), which the Senate and House approved on November 17 and 18, respectively. The President signed P.L. 98-181 (97 Stat. 1153) into law on November 30. The IMF component of the legislation increased the U.S. quota in the IMF by $5.8 billion and authorized a $2.6 billion increase in the U.S. contribution to the General Arrangements to Borrow. 162. Memorandum From Secretary of Defense Weinberger to President Reagan¹

SUBJECT

Goals and Priorities (U)

(U) When you took office you established an action agenda that included:

- Significant movement toward reducing the risk of nuclear war through an active program to modernize our deterrent and to negotiate significant reductions in the levels of nuclear armaments.
- A reversal in the decline of our military capability vis-a-vis the Soviet Union and a restoration of the Nation's margin of safety.

¹ Source: Reagan Library, Executive Secretariat, NSC Subject File, Goals and Priorities (June 1983). Confidential. A stamped notation indicates that it was received in the White House on June 23 at 4:20 p.m.

- A revitalization of our role as the leader of the Free World.
- An increase in the security and freedom of the world community, based on the rule of law and the inalienable rights of the individual.

(U) This Administration has made major progress toward carrying out this agenda. It is appropriate that we now reflect on our progress to date and to lay out our program to finish the task that we boldly undertook when you began your Administration.

(C) The following thoughts represent the considered views of this Department in setting priorities and an agenda for continuing our progress. We have sought to incorporate objectives that both follow-up on current activities and break new ground as well. Broadly speaking, we have grouped our proposed initiatives into four major categories:

- Reducing the Risk of Nuclear War
- Maintaining the Defense Buildup to Restore the Nation's Margin of Safety
 - Supporting our Policies Worldwide
 - Broad Initiatives, with a National Security Content, to Reinforce America's Image Abroad and at Home

REDUCING THE RISK OF NUCLEAR WAR

(U) Your Administration has devoted a new and carefully balanced effort to reduce the risk of nuclear war. We have successfully launched our strategic forces modernization programs and arms reduction initiatives in order to achieve this goal.

(C) Your strategic forces modernization program strengthens deterrence, enhances our credibility as a negotiating partner in arms reduction talks, and improves our image as a leader of the Free World.

(C) It is important that we made the Nation more fully aware of our progress in achieving better command, control, and communications for our strategic nuclear forces. While these systems account for a small fraction of our strategic force costs, they are vital in ensuring that we have a safe and effective deterrent.

• The issue about the safety of command and control, fueled by the recent "War Games" movie,² could be turned to our advantage as we publicize planned and accomplished improvements to ensure firm control over our forces. We could demonstrate how your initiatives provide for greater nuclear safety in peacetime, as well as control, survivability, and responsiveness of our forces in the event of attack.

(C) We should also highlight our ongoing efforts in the realm of space and strategic defense, as a follow-up to your recent speech. We must continue to publicize our efforts to expand our deterrent to include a defensive capability, explaining the rationality of this approach and its consistency with our overall deterrence and arms reduction policies.

- We should utilize space-related events, such as your welcome of the Space Shuttle astronauts, for a Presidential address on these themes, as well as on the importance of our other space initiatives including the Combined Space Operations Center.

- Another speech by you on your strategic defense initiatives could include some of the actual technological problems involved and possible solutions. For example—you could point out that while we can track and destroy some Soviet missiles now, we need enormously increased computer abilities to locate, track on thousands of Soviet missiles and then fire assembled weapons to destroy the Soviet missiles before they get into our atmosphere. It can be done but it is a big job.

(C) This Administration can count among its major achievements the formulation of arms reduction initiatives that in both breadth and scope go well beyond mere limitations to the growth of both strategic and intermediate range nuclear systems. We must maintain these initiatives and explain our premises to the American people.

- You might utilize the State of the Union address as an opportunity to highlight two key concepts that govern our policy:

- That we are determined to raise the nuclear threshold, and that nuclear arms reduction, coupled with a strong conventional force capability provides the best hope of doing so.

- That we cannot achieve anything in this regard without Soviet cooperation, and that while we have modified our proposals to retain maximum negotiating flexibility, the Soviets must, of their part, become less rigid if a meaningful agreement is to be achieved.

MAINTAINING THE DEFENSE BUILDUP TO RESTORE THE NATION'S MARGIN OF SAFETY

(C) A key element of any strategy for raising and keeping the nuclear threshold as high as possible, both in NATO and elsewhere, is the readiness and combat staying power of our conventional combat forces. Thus far—in the first two years of this Administration—we have successfully identified the Nation's defense requirements and received from the Congress necessary funding to get a start on meeting our national security objectives. This task has not been without a good deal of effort and political will. Our military strategy is balanced in terms of priorities between readiness and sustainability, and modernization and investment in new technology. Without continued adequate funding in the decade of the 1980s we could lose this balance.

(C) We must persevere in our determination to improve our own combat readiness and encourage our Allies to do the same. Similarly, we must set the example for our Allies, by ensuring that our own forces could fight a conventional war as long as could the Warsaw Pact.

(C) We have achieved a good rate of increase in the level of funding in this area for both active and reserve forces. This must continue. Our forces are now becoming better trained, better equipped, and more mobile, thanks to more and better manpower programs and the availability of additional reserve stocks, spare parts, and equipment. We have also emphasized improved airlift and sealift for our rapidly deployed forces.

(C) As part of our efforts to modernize our conventional forces, this Administration is taking the lead in pressing the Alliance to employ new technologies to enhance NATO's conventional capabilities and begin to offset the Soviet quantitative superiority and qualitative improvement that threaten to undermine the balance of forces in Europe.

(U) We should take the lead in developing a public recognition of the success of the Defense Department in improving the efficiency of its operation and acquisition management and the strengthening of the industrial base. In addition, we should stress the contributions the Defense Department has made to enhancing our industrial base and its responsiveness in peacetime and during any mobilization.

- You might also wish to visit some major defense industry factories or shipyards, and in a speech call attention to the vital need for us to develop an industrial base that could respond as we did in 1941.

(U) Your Administration can point with great pride to its successful effort to enhance the public image of a voluntary military career. The pressure on the *All-Volunteer Force*³ will increase as the economy improves and as the population segment from which recruits are drawn shrinks during the second half of this decade. People serving in the Armed Forces today do so with great pride and with much greater respect and recognition from the general public. It is important, therefore, to maintain the commitment to providing our forces with levels of pay and benefits that will continue to make service in the military a career that is rightly viewed as one that is not only challenging but worthy of respect by the population at large.

³The Nixon administration established a draft lottery system in 1969 and renewed the system in 1971. In 1972, Nixon announced that the All-Volunteer Force would replace the Selective Service System by July 1973. See Foreign Relations, 1969–1976, vol. XXXIV, National Security Policy, 1969–1972, Documents 131, 133, 135, 138, 138, and 228.

- The “Army of Excellence” program (which seeks to achieve excellence in individual soldiers, their leaders, units and equipment) could be highlighted as one attempt to instill excellence into all aspects of military activity. It is this quality of our soldiers as well as their ability to think and act for themselves in emergency, and the ways in which our system of freedom encourages the development of individual initiatives and skills that distinguish our soldiers from those of the Soviet Union, who do not have the benefits of this tradition of freedom, and individual liberty. You could stress this theme during a visit to a field training exercise and to events such as the roll-out of the first B-1B bomber. In addition, this Administration should reaffirm the importance of physical fitness in the American way of life, capitalizing upon current Service fitness programs and the holding of the 1984 Summer Olympics in the United States.⁴

- There are a number of ways in which you could personally involve yourself in reinforcing and reaffirming the Administration’s commitment to people/fitness programs. You might use the occasion of a visit to the Fort Sheridan, Illinois, Headquarters of the U.S. Army Recruiting Command, or to other Service recruiting centers, to make a major speech outlining our ongoing commitment to maintaining high quality, volunteer Armed Forces. Alternatively, you might wish to combine the themes of maintaining a quality force with physical fitness by visiting the Army Fitness Center at Fort Benjamin Harrison, Indiana. Finally, the physical fitness theme could be voiced in a major address at the opening of the Summer Olympics.

SUPPORTING OUR POLICIES WORLDWIDE

(C) The U.S. public shares our basic concerns about the stability of Central and Latin America. But we must develop a more coherent approach to promoting greater stability in these regions. This approach should focus on social reforms as well as economic and military assistance.

- I have referred to Central America as part of “mainland” America. We should reinforce this theme at every opportunity. A Presidential visit to Costa Rica could be particularly effective in this regard. Costa Rica is an “embattled democracy.” Its problems could evoke sympathy by the American public, and a visit would demonstrate to both our own public and to Latin America and the world that we are committed to the defense of those values upon which this Nation was built.

⁴Scheduled to take place in Los Angeles, July 28–August 12, 1984.

(C) We must continue to strive for a settlement of the Middle East conflict, but we must be under no illusions as to the imminence of our success.

- One accomplishment we can point to now is the success we have achieved in training the Lebanese Armed Forces, an ongoing effort that can only enhance that country's changes of achieving stability once foreign forces have left its territory.

INITIATIVES, WITH A NATIONAL SECURITY CONTENT, THAT ENHANCE AMERICA'S IMAGE

(U) There are a number of steps that this Administration can take that would project a more positive image of U.S. policies and values, thereby improving our political and security relations with overseas states, notably in the Third World. Examples of such initiatives include:

- Establishment of a bipartisan commission to plan observances of the many bicentennial anniversaries that will take place between 1983—the anniversary of the signing of the Treaty of Paris, that ended our revolutionary war—and in 1992—the 500th Anniversary of the discovery of America.⁵

- You might wish to use the occasion of the October 1983 bicentennial of the Treaty of Paris to have a ceremony in the Rose Garden, in the presence of the Ambassadors of the U.K. and France, where you could announce your support for the bicentennial commission. The more we can reinforce a sense of history, particularly in our young people, the more our Nation will understand and support the policies we are trying to implement.

- Finally, and importantly, DoD is sensitive to the enormous toll in wrecked lives, sapped human productivity, violence and other crime that this Nation bears as a result of the trade in illegal drugs—both smuggling drugs across our borders and the clandestine, avaricious network that distributes drugs within the country. Defense has already rendered substantial assistance to the U.S. Coast Guard and civilian law enforcement agencies in their attempt to break this illegal drug traffic. We will of course, continue to respond to the leadership of our Commander in Chief in the war on drugs. You may wish to highlight the role of Defense in this regard, consistent with current law, as you continue to voice your opposition to this menace to our society.

163. Memorandum From Robert Sims of the National Security Council Staff to the President's Deputy Assistant for National Security Affairs (McFarlane)¹

Washington, June 30, 1983

SUBJECT

RR Goals and Objectives Memo

As authorized by you and Judge Clark, I confirmed for Bob Toth of the Los Angeles Times the existence of the President's memo to State and Defense, and said it was sent "in early June".² I paraphrased paragraph one of the memo and gave Toth direct quotes on the six new policies that have been catalysts in changing perceptions abroad of the United States as a nation in decline:

—Firm commitment to the restoration of the military foundation of our national security policies.

—Establishing a new relationship with the Soviet Union based upon the principles of reciprocity and restraint.

—Restoring confidence and cohesion among our allies.

—Defining a comprehensive and responsible policy for the reduction of strategic and general purpose armaments.

—Establishing a new basis for the conduct of relations with developing countries.

—Maintaining a firm commitment to lead in efforts to bring peace to troubled regions (Middle East, Southern Africa, etc.)

I told Toth the remainder of the memo dealt with the President's request for the thoughts of the Secretaries on goals that he could realistically hope to achieve "in the first term". In response to Toth's question, I said the memo was not politically motivated (he had been told it was a request for ideas about things to do to win the election). Rather, I said, the memo is realistic in setting the end of the term as a logical parameter for planning purposes—but the basic motivation for the memo relates to the President's desire for a long-term bipartisan foreign policy of the kind this country once had.

I told Toth replies have been received and are being staffed by NSC prior to Presidential consideration. I gave Toth no information about the substantive part of the memo, or the common objectives section. He expects to write the story tomorrow for the weekend newspaper and may call you about it. I have alerted Mort Allin so that Larry Speakes can be prepared to confirm the items mentioned above after the story appears.

SUBJECT

US Foreign Policy: The Year Ahead—and Beyond

We wanted to follow up promptly on Larry's discussion with you last week on the need for a broader, more integrated approach to our foreign policy.² We are convinced that all of us on the 7th Floor can benefit from looking beyond the immediate to our longer-term and more fundamental purposes. We have a few specific suggestions.

First, we will sharpen the focus on the longer-term dimensions of certain top priority issues, both to provide a sense of our longer-term strategy in core areas of our foreign policy interests and to illuminate policy choices over the next 6–18 months. These issues would include US-Soviet relations, the Mideast, Central America and perhaps southern Africa.

Second, we need to give greater attention to those major subjects which are not now of pressing urgency but which nonetheless are of great importance to US interests. In this regard, the Foreign Policy Directions exercise is continuing. After much exhortation we have received some papers from the bureaus. Frankly, they are of uneven quality. Steve will send those forward which deserve the attention of you and the Secretary while continuing to work the others.

Confidential; Nodis. Drafted by Kaplan. Hill initialed the top right-hand corner of the memorandum and wrote: "7/15."

² No record of this conversation has been found.

In the meantime, S/P is itself working on some key issues which are of both immediate and longer-term importance to the institution of integrated, coherent global policy.

In particular:

—Japan. How can we continue to strengthen US-Japanese international cooperation? How is Japan's role likely to evolve in the 1980s and what can we do in the period ahead to influence Japanese evolution in constructive directions? What are the areas in which we should encourage/discourage greater Japanese cooperation and assertiveness? How should we manage the critical interaction between domestic and foreign policy aspects of our relations with Japan? Should we seek to pursue our interests with Japan primarily on a bilateral basis or should we seek to expand Japan's participation in allied multilateral arrangements?

—Western Europe. Where is Europe (and especially Germany) headed in the 1980s and what can we do to influence that direction? Clearly, we are dealing with a very different Western (and for that matter Eastern) Europe than that of the early 1970s, much less the 1950s or 60s. Europe's real and relative weight in the world has declined over the last decade, pacifism is a serious problem, the European Community is divided and there are some worrisome political and economic trends. Moreover, continued European security dependence on the US nearly 40 years after WWII creates major psychological insecurities for some of our allies. Managing this aspect will be an especially crucial aspect of dealing with the German question.

—North-South. The Secretary's April speech won much praise as a thoughtful approach to the developing countries. The need now is to develop a systematic and concrete strategy for pursuing and implementing this strategy. Given the major economic, financial and security issues facing the LDCs, and our tight budgetary situation, this will be a real challenge. But it is long overdue.

S/P will be doing papers on these subjects in the period ahead. Each paper will draw from the longer-term perspective in providing suggestions concerning policy or strategy for the next six months. Steve will send these papers forward as they are completed and suggest meetings with you, the Secretary and Larry.

165. Memorandum From the President's Assistant for National Security Affairs (Clark) to President Reagan¹

Washington, July 15, 1983

SUBJECT

Executive Summary: Goals and Priorities Paper

Below are a number of foreign policy ideas, which, taken collectively, offer a challenging and strategically focused program for the next 18 months. We are developing a separate and more detailed strategy paper, but wanted to get your reaction first to the key ideas set forth in this Executive Summary. I am also attaching the Shultz/Weinberger responses to your original memo of June 7, 1983 (Tab A).²

Resources: The Key to All Else

An extraordinary amount of what we want to do over the next two years hinges on our ability to get foreign assistance resources—to train, to reward, to encourage risks for peace, to punish. We have few other tools to work with; the words of our diplomats will only go so far. Even though the foreign assistance budget has grown each year, it is small in comparison with resources available in the post-war years. We need to replenish these investments to pave the way for a more secure and hospitable world.

We believe you should mount a major campaign—not so much to remove restrictions on existing aid (a separate problem)—but to increase levels in the aggregate.

One dramatic way of achieving this would be for you to publicly announce a plan to cancel a specially selected conventional weapons program now on drawing board—preferably one in some political trouble anyway—and to use the savings thus obtained to rebuild the foreign assistance account. This would operationalize the point we have tried so hard to make: namely, foreign assistance often makes a more immediate and direct contribution to our security than our own defense programs.

We suggest other ideas as well, such as a first phase effort to rebuild our foreign military training budget. This will be less costly, but if done ambitiously, could be equally important. It is easier to take these problems head on and be honest about real needs, rather than nibble at the edges.

Non-Proliferation: Unifying the Nuclear Suppliers

We have tried to strike a balance between actions that have immediate payoffs and actions that help us gain control over dangerous long range trends. Non-proliferation falls in this latter category. The spread of nuclear weapons will open up new options for radicals, force us and our allies to spend more for defense, and complicate arms control. To complement our sensitive intelligence and export control programs, we suggest giving even more public visibility to your comprehensive safeguards initiative. We propose trying to split the ranks of our allies, gaining early support of the British and Germans, nailing down a Japanese commitment on your trip, and—if necessary—isolating the French. A related goal is to end maverick, unsafeguarded Chinese nuclear exports using the positive leverage of our technology transfer program. Success on either or both fronts would be dramatic. The safeguards goal has eluded past Administrations. Your willingness to help Europe and Japan on other nuclear issues should provide the grease. This can legitimately be billed as a major arms control victory, and it is more immediately in sight than some of the others.

Defense: A Campaign to Raise the Nuclear Threshold

The ongoing debate about nuclear war has at least forced sensible persons to think more about the desirability of conventional defense. Moreover, new highly accurate technologies and deep-strike tactics may make a credible conventional capability possible at a more tolerable financial cost. For reasons too complex to elaborate here, accurate munitions have even more decisive effects on the flanks and Persian Gulf where our existing deterrent capability is particularly weak. Improved conventional defense capabilities have an importance that transcends their deterrent effect: namely that of making our allies more self-confident in the political-military competition that is ahead.

The problem to date is that much of this work is unfocused: many of the most interesting technologies are underfunded; they are not tied together as part of a coherent program; and our public affairs approach has not yet been harnessed to the possibilities at hand. We propose an urgent internal effort to bring these various strands together and to accelerate the most promising technological possibilities. What we want to do is create a new framework for our defense efforts raising the nuclear threshold. This helps us retain the high ground and demonstrate that it is we—rather than the Soviets, with their empty declarations—who take seriously the issue of avoiding the “first use” of nuclear weapons. Moreover, precisely because overall defense investments are unlikely to increase as much as we would like, we have to be sophisticated in achieving the maximum payoff from the investments we have.

Middle East: A Tortured Choice

The Middle East has probably never been more reflective of the fable you tell about the scorpion and the turtle. Assad is playing a waiting game and seems more interested in demonstrating his dominance over the other Arab States than in withdrawing from Lebanon or facilitating an autonomy agreement. Not only does this mean that it will be difficult over the near term for you to achieve your goals in both of these areas, it also means that you have a new objective with which to cope: limiting Syrian influence and, by implication, that of Syria's Soviet patron.

We need then to begin to redefine for the public what it is possible to do, so that expectations are not totally dashed. We need to make clear that we have solid intermediate goals that can be met. These include: building the authority of the Lebanese government; enhancing stability in Lebanon; frustrating Syrian efforts to intimidate our friends, and nurturing changes on the West Bank and Gaza that keep hope alive until fundamental conditions have shifted more in our favor—at which time we may want to propose something more dramatic, like calling Mubarak, Hussein, Begin, and other West Bank notables to Washington.

For the near term we must help shape the Israeli partial withdrawal in ways that give confidence to the Lebanese while maintaining pressure on Syria. Along with our allies we will need to fill the gaps caused by the departing Israelis.

The relationship with Saudi Arabia also deserves close attention given the Saudis' inability to go very far in taking risks for peace. Rather than increase their discomfiture (while ironically inflating their importance) by asking them to do things they will never be able to do—and yet for which we somehow become indebted—we may want to ask them to take more effective action on things they can do: e.g., more assistance for Turkey, Sudan, Somalia—and less badgering of Oman.

Soviet Union: Striking a Deal While Redefining Expectations

Managing the Soviet relationship over the next eighteen months will require two things: first, probes to determine whether our strength and seriousness have as yet created real openings in the Soviet position; and second, measures to sustain support policies that have increased our leverage.

The key is to recognize that these two efforts are decisively related: the more strength we amass the greater the likelihood we can create openings; less obvious, perhaps, but equally vital, the more serious we are about looking for openings, the better chance we have of maintaining support for tough policies in all of the many areas where toughness will continue to be necessary.

More than our ability to reach any specific agreement, the real test before us is to try to permanently redefine U.S. policy toward the Soviet Union. This means, in short, making clear that the most likely medium-run goal is an enduring but safer competition, one in which we do not reach agreement on everything—nor pretend that we can—but rather press to find agreement in particular areas. While it is in our interest to force tough choices upon the Soviets and to compel them to foresake opportunities, it is not in our interest to make them desperate and more inclined to take great risks.

The difference between this approach and detente is clear. We have to push on every issue, but our activism on many fronts does not mean we need progress on every front to succeed. If we think we do, we will be pushed to split the difference on issue after issue. This was precisely the problem with detente: it split the difference with the Soviets too often, and ended up with second best across the board. It also ignored the need for creating pressure and put the form of agreement ahead of content.

This leads to the question of a summit. The risks of a summit are clear. But there are dangers, too, in appearing unwilling to talk, since this could cause our consensus for competition in other areas to unravel. We need to realize that if our friends feel our hostility is unbounded, making every conflict a possible stepping stone to a wider war, their willingness to compete at all will rapidly decline.

We propose trying to lay the foundation for a summit aimed at a controlled and balanced outcome—an outcome that in fact reflects the new balance in public understanding we hope to strike. On the positive side this means shooting for an arms control agreement. But if an agreement were the sole focal point, that fact would be determinative in shaping public expectations. Hence, we will need to lay down some hard markers on Central America, Afghanistan, and chemical weapons violations. We need to be clear in communicating what we want. And we need a program for turning up the pressure to demonstrate that a Summit doesn't mean an end in our willingness to compete. A special new White House/NSC channel—similar to what was once contemplated under the Kennedy Administration—may provide a unique way of communicating these messages.

Central America: Facing Up to Requirements

If we are to remain credible to our allies and at the same time avoid a human and refugee tragedy of massive proportions, we must reverse the course of current events in the region. The historical record cannot be left to show that while the Soviets were committing over $4B a year and positioning thousands of troops and advisors in and through Cuba, we countered with less than $500M and 120 military advisors in El Salvador and Honduras.

A strategy for success mandates that we heighten attention to the risk that we could face within a year, a historic failure which would permanently damage the national security position of the United States. At the same time we must emphasize the breadth of our opportunity to promote democracy, recognizing that democracy itself is the single best means of assuring human rights.

We need to cogently present what it will take to prevent a failure and educate the American people on the responsibility of the Congress to provide adequate resources for the execution of a successful policy. This should be accomplished by:

- A Presidentially mandated bipartisan commission.
- A renewed round of working visits by Monge, Suazo, and others.
- New pressure on the EEC.
- A regional diplomatic offensive that is counterbalanced by new efforts to isolate radicals.
- New military pressures.
- A Presidential trip.

Persian Gulf: Making Our Power More Commensurate With Our Interests

Our power in the Persian Gulf is still not commensurate with our interests. We need to move quickly to reverse this situation. Khomeini's passing may create opportunities too large for the Soviets to resist, and for which we have done too little planning. The key is to break free of self-imposed constraints and begin to make greater use of three large assets: Turkey, new technologies (also referred to in the section on defense), and Israel. The National Security Decision Directive you just signed sets this in motion.³

Among the specific initiatives we foresee:

- Cooperation with Israel to work together in the event of Soviet attack in the Gulf.
- A diplomatic initiative in the Aegean to end—or reduce—the disagreements of our Greek and Turkish friends.
- New efforts, coupled to your resource initiative, to help Turkey truly modernize its forces.
- Innovative near term steps with the Germans and others to signal the Soviets we will use Turkish geography to exploit their vulnerabilities if they attack the Persian Gulf.

³ Presumable reference to NSDD 99, "United States Security Strategy for the Near East and South Asia," issued on July 12. It is scheduled for publication in Foreign Relations, 1981–1988, vol. XXII, Middle East Region; Arabian Peninsula.

- A quiet effort to identify vulnerabilities among key Soviet clients and to exploit these vulnerabilities—particularly S. Yemen—to show that Soviet gains are reversible.

- A special emissary to our key NATO allies to lay out our master plan and specific requirements. We may need to cut back on some of the many marginal things we are asking the allies to do in order to channel their efforts into higher payoff opportunities. We must end our piecemeal approach to this problem. This only gives our allies an excuse to hold back, since they are never sure of our bottom line.

Asia: Building on an Inherent Dynamism

Japan should remain the cornerstone of our Asian strategy. Our objectives with Japan should: (1) encourage that country to open its markets; (2) continue our push for viable self-defense capabilities; (3) respond positively ourselves to the defense initiatives Nakasone has already outlined; and (4) stimulate genuinely significant, better coordinated, and more strategically oriented Japanese foreign assistance investments.

We think you might strike an agreement on your trip to form a U.S.-Japanese foreign assistance coordinating committee.⁴ We will also be developing imaginative ideas for increasing Japan's defense commitments, e.g., by drawing attention to the subsidy now built into Japanese procurement costs we may be able to persuade the government to write part of that subsidy off to an account other than the Defense Forces. Ultimately, this could trigger a common-sense reaction that would lead to more direct weapons sales from the U.S. This in turn would allow the Japanese to get "more bang for the yen" and also would correct the trade balance. We also need to recognize the far-reaching importance of Nakasone's willingness to close the Straits and to take account of this in our joint exercises.

On the Korean peninsula we must continue to explore all practical options to reduce tensions while further enhancing a credible defense posture capable of responding to a surprise attack from the North. We will be looking at ways to begin to stimulate subtle forms of Japanese-Korean defense cooperation.

With China, we will *complete the liberalization of our technology transfer effort*⁵ and, hopefully use this, to tax Soviet defense investment patterns in ways favorable to the U.S. We also hope to convert the liberalized technology program into political gains. We think we can show real progress in bringing China in line on nuclear export policy.

⁴The President was scheduled to visit Japan, November 9–12.

⁵See footnote 12, Document 161.

Finally, we need to pay attention to quick-fixes that could potentially improve China's capability to withstand certain selective military pressures from the Soviets. This is important for preventing a Soviet effort to coerce and neutralize China without recourse to a major war. We will also key in on a U.S. visit by Zhao Ziyang to help demonstrate your attention to U.S.-PRC relations.

Africa: New Possibilities for Pressure and Diplomacy

In Africa we are also looking at a program that would emphasize both continuity and innovation.

A priority objective for the next 18 months is Cuban troop withdrawal from Angola, in connection with an agreement on independence for Namibia. Besides being a success for our Soviet policy, this major achievement would strengthen the African and domestic flanks of our policy of constructive engagement with South Africa. A Presidential speech to the U.N. General Assembly would be an occasion to reiterate our objectives, but other forms of direct involvement by you may also be required.

Our present strategy of linking Angola and Namibia is the right way to pursue our interests even if it does not produce immediate results. If the obstacle turns out to be South African reluctance to accept an Angolan proposal we think is reasonable, we could dangle the prospect of a P.W. Botha visit to Washington. Given the legitimate political sensitivities here, a visit would probably be best in the context of final agreement on a Namibia solution coupled with U.S. encouragement of further internal reforms.

We envision other innovative, and strategically focused initiatives as well:

- We may want to work quietly through the Somali insurgents in Ethiopia to start making life more difficult for Cuban-troops in that country. Moreover, we need to fortify Somalia against the threats they now face and we need to discourage the Soviets from trying to embarrass us in Somalia, thereby discrediting our broader regional strategy.
- We also think it may be possible to turn the limited rapprochement between Somalia and Kenya into a larger U.S. diplomatic success story. This would make it easier for Somalia to get assistance from Congress and would further isolate Ethiopia.
- We think we may be able to promote a deal in Northwest Africa in which Spain would make concessions to Morocco to provide a cover for Morocco's settlement of the Western Somalia dispute. France in turn would reward the Spanish by earlier entry into the EEC. And this in turn would help us get Spain into NATO.

Conclusion

It is all too easy—and equally wrong—to try to shape policy to affect tomorrow's headlines. We have tried to focus instead on actions that will leave an unmistakable and constructive legacy for the future, both in terms of improved international security and a deeper public understanding of the difficult—if inherently manageable—problems that lie ahead. At the same time, we are sensitive to the fact that concrete, near-term success in certain areas may be necessary to create momentum and mobilize support for longer-range and more difficult foreign policy objectives.

It is also easy to spawn a long list of desirable objectives that bear little relationship to one another—to ignore, in short, the critical problem of tradeoffs among competing alternatives and to forget that our leverage over both allies and adversaries is far from infinite. We have tried to be sensitive to these constraints in what follows, though ultimately you will yourself have to wrestle with this fact of life as you think through your approach to the possibilities outlined below.

Many of the goals we recommend are now possible because of the strides that have been made in rebuilding American power and in cultivating an image of consistency and perseverance. Nonetheless, we have a long way to go. We must continue rebuilding our strength, recognizing that doing so will open up even more opportunities. This is because our friends and foes will continue to alter their expectations in accordance with their ever increasing appreciation for U.S. strength.

The conventional wisdom of course is that Presidents consolidate rather than innovate in the second two years of their term. While this is to some extent inevitable, we believe the argument for innovation is also strong. First, there is much yet that needs to be done. Second, the shifting pattern of international events—and the offensives of our adversaries—make it both dangerous and difficult to simply consolidate success. Third, new initiatives can help us continue to set and refine the agenda for debate and deflect attention from problems whose solution will come only over a much longer period of time.

166. Information Memorandum From the Chairman of the Policy Planning Council (Bosworth) to Secretary of State Shultz¹

Washington, July 25, 1983

SUBJECT

Central America—Our Strategy and the Presidential Commission²

I. The Presidential Commission is the latest attempt to deal with the gap between our interests in Central America and the policies we are able to employ to defend those interests.

There is little prospect, however, that the Commission will be able to change the fundamental domestic attitudes which constrain our policy in Central America:

—We will not be able to mobilize political support for the direct use of U.S. military force; and —We will not be able to set aside concerns over human rights in El Salvador or domestic opposition to the U.S. overthrow of the Sandinista regime.

On the other hand, the Commission does provide an opportunity to build public and Congressional support for a long-term program of more U.S. aid to the region. While more aid is not by itself sufficient as a policy, it will be extremely useful.

² In remarks made at the quadrennial convention of the International Longshoremen's Association in Hollywood, Florida, July 18, the President announced the creation of "a bipartisan national commission on Central America. The commission will lay the foundation for a long-term, unified, national approach to the freedom and independence of the countries of Central America. The commission will be honored by a very distinguished American, outstanding in the field of diplomacy, virtually a legend in that field. It will be headed by Dr. Henry Kissinger, who will present recommendations to me later this year. Their focus will be on long term, looking to what it is that we want and what we must do in the years ahead to meet the underlying problems of the region." (Public Papers: Reagan, 1983, Book II, p. 1047) Executive Order 12433, July 19, formally established the Commission; for the text, see ibid., pp. 1054–1055. Also, on July 19, the White House released a statement listing the individuals to be appointed to the Commission; for the text, see ibid., pp. 1055–1056.

Also, this should be an opportunity, as in the case of the Scowcroft Commission,³ to broaden support for our overall strategy in the Congress and improve our ability to sustain it over the critical period of the next 18 months.

II. This paper examines two major issues we need to face over the next few months:

- 1) How to get better performance out of the Salvadorans, militarily, politically and in human rights area?
- 2) What we are willing to settle for in Nicaragua?

EL SALVADOR

Our objectives in El Salvador are democratization/reform while wearing down the guerrillas militarily and marginalizing them politically. Two problems, resources and Salvadorans' attitudes, have hampered our progress. We have not been able to provide enough resources and the assurance that they will be available long enough for reforms to be consolidated and the guerrillas kept on the defensive. But the disappointing Salvadoran performance is also a result of the fact that as our political commitment increases, the Salvadorans conclude that our stake is so great that we will do whatever may be necessary to prevent a Leftist victory, regardless of what they themselves do or don't do.

The Presidential Commission is obviously an opportunity to deal with the resource issue. But it may also be an opportunity to try to deal with the second problem—Salvadoran attitudes. In fact, the Commission's success in dealing with the resource problem will depend heavily on its being able to present a credible scenario for moving the Salvadorans on political development, human rights and military performance. It must be able to justify more resources by showing that they will produce results in all these areas.

³ Public Law 97-377 (see footnote 4, Document 129) required the administration to produce a report concerning the basing mode for the Peacekeeper missiles. On January 3, the President announced the establishment of a bipartisan Commission on Strategic Forces, chaired by Scowcroft, to review the strategic modernization program. The text of the statement is printed in Public Papers: Reagan, 1983, Book I, pp. 4-5. On April 11, the Commission presented a report to the President, recommending that the United States base 100 MX missiles in Minuteman silos and consider developing a new single-warhead missile. (Hedrick Smith, "MX Panel Proposes Basing 100 Missiles in Minuteman Silos: Urges New Limit on Arms," New York Times, April 12, 1983, pp. A1, A20) The Report of The President's Commission on Strategic Forces, April 6, is printed in Documents on Disarmament, 1983, pp. 273-300. On April 19, the President endorsed the Scowcroft Commission's recommendations. (Public Papers: Reagan, 1983, Book I, p. 555) Both the House and Senate, in late May, approved the release of funds for the MX. (Steven V. Roberts, "President's Plan for Basing of MX Approved in House: Key Victory for Reagan," New York Times, May 25, 1983, pp. A1, A18, and Margot Hornblower, "Senate Completes Reagan's Victory On MX Funding," Washington Post, May 26, 1983, pp. A1, A18)

Our approach to El Salvador over the past two years, and particularly the last six months, has been one of creeping involvement in nearly all aspects of policy formulation and implementation. Our military assistance program has become increasingly detailed in its focus on tactics, logistics, intelligence collection, etc.; on the political level, we press for early elections and then take on major responsibility for funding and organizing them; we have become the sponsors of judicial reform; etc., etc.

It can be debated whether this approach is working: is the Army making permanent gains, is polarization between the Right and the Center lessening, is the human rights performance improving? What is not disputable, however, is that our increased assumption of responsibility has greatly reinforced the Salvadoran tendency to conclude that El Salvador has become more important to us than to the Salvadorans. Our ability to use any real leverage on specific issues has diminished. Our increased involvement as program managers also risks increased anti-Americanism which would contribute to the reduction in our ability to control events.

We now appear to be leaning toward increasing substantially our involvement on the military front, in terms of both resources and the number and the role of U.S. personnel. But, increased U.S. involvement in the military effort, unless accompanied by reinforcement of the other elements of our strategy, ignores our analysis of the past two years: that the underlying problem in El Salvador is political, not military. To get on with the political solution (democratization, human rights, economic reform, etc.) the Salvadorans—not the Americans—have to take the lead. Ironically, progress on the military front will also complicate progress on the political front, since much of the blame for the country's enduring political polarization is attributed to the military's tendency to see itself as above the law and deserving of political power—a tendency that will be reinforced by success against the guerrillas. Similarly, our push for early Presidential elections threatens to exacerbate polarization through a Duarte-D'Aubuisson race and thus produce a government with even less ability to govern than at present.

In the meantime, the situation in the Congress approaches gridlock. There is not now a majority willing to take the political risk of cutting off military aid to El Salvador. But there is extreme anxiety over growing American military involvement and diminishing confidence that the democratization/reform strategy is working. Without substantial change in current Congressional attitudes, it is unlikely that we can obtain any major increase in aid, particularly military aid. The Congressional problem will become even more difficult as we get closer to the Presidential campaign.

Clearly, we need an alternative approach which addresses these problems. In particular, we must:

- provide more—substantially more—resources over a reasonable period of time (one to two years);
- put the burden for performance squarely back on the Salvadorans; and
- insulate El Salvador from the upcoming American electoral campaign.

The Presidential Commission may present an opportunity to establish such an approach.

A Possible Medium-Term Compact

We would use the Commission and its report to establish a three-way compact among the Congress, the Administration, and the Government of El Salvador. First, the Commission would develop a series of objectives for Salvadorans over the next two years. For example,

- Continued progress on democratization with a series of elections over the next two years segmented, timed, and organized as the Salvadorans themselves decide. We want to see functioning elected institutions in place in two years (i.e., municipal governments, National Assembly, and a National Executive). A credible opportunity for participation by the Left would exist at each stage and we would remain available to facilitate contacts;
- Continued implementation of the new national counter-insurgency program;
- Concrete, meaningful evidence that the Army and security forces are being brought under civilian control with visible punishment for abusers of the civilian population; and
- Solid, reasonable progress toward judicial reform;
- Completion of land reform on a basis to be agreed between the GOES and the Campesino organizations.

These objectives would in effect be negotiated with the Salvadorans (Government, military, and political parties) who would sign on to them as firm undertakings. It would be up to the Salvadorans to decide how they will meet these goals. We might provide technical assistance in some cases but it would basically be their problem. The quid for all this would be a major increase in aid guaranteed for the period of the compact.

The compact would simultaneously be negotiated with the Congress. The Commission would obviously have a key role here. Most importantly, it would have to sell the concept and the extended funding commitment. This would be difficult, and the Administration might well have to accept limits on its actions during the period of the compact, particularly on such neuralgic issues as the number and role of U.S. military personnel in El Salvador. But I believe there may be substantial Congressional enthusiasm for the concept. It takes away the political risk during the campaign period of a “who lost Central America” debate while keeping the focus on democratization and reform.

What would happen at the end of the contract period would have to be negotiated between the Administration and the Congress. The Commission could play a role in the evaluation of Salvadoran performance at the end of the compact period and, possibly as a monitor of performance during the period. The President should obviously try to keep his post-compact options as unconstrained as possible. But we would have to recognize that a Salvadoran performance which fell far short of the agreed goals would, as a matter of political reality, restrict our subsequent policy choices.

On the other hand, we would have gained two years, more resources, and reduced the risk that El Salvador will be a major issue in the 1984 election. There is also, I believe, a real chance that the Salvadorans would begin to perform more effectively, and we could see real progress.

NICARAGUA

Since mid-1981, our policy toward Nicaragua has aimed at creating a situation in which the Sandinistas would stop providing direct support to the guerrillas in El Salvador and rein in their “revolution without frontiers.” We have emphasized diplomatic and public information efforts to isolate Nicaragua. However, we believed that diplomatic pressure alone would not be enough and that we also had to “take the war to Nicaragua.”

This policy was based on two key judgments. First, we did not believe that the Nicaraguan opposition groups would be able to rally sufficient popular support to overthrow the Sandinistas within the foreseeable future. (Eden Pastora was a potential wild card. He claimed he would be able to rally substantial numbers of Sandinista troops and bring down the FSLN Directorate. But he has not shown that he can deliver, and it would clearly be imprudent to base our policy on the hope that he will.)

Secondly, we concluded that direct U.S. military action to dislodge the Sandinistas was not feasible. Barring a major provocation (e.g. Nicaraguan invasion of Honduras, introduction of large numbers of Cuban troops in organized units), we would not be able to rally sufficient support in the Congress or in the region to be able to sustain a U.S. military intervention or quarantine. Moreover, even with substantial numbers of U.S. troops, we would not be able to defeat the Sandinistas militarily. They would fade back into the hills and wait us out in a Nicaragua in which only a minority of the population would see the U.S. military presence as an act of deliverance.

Current Situation

There are some signs that this policy of limited objectives is beginning to work. Regional isolation and some pressure from the Contras, together with a moderate but critical shift in the Mexican position (i.e., Cancun declaration⁴), have gotten the FSLN's attention. Their approaches to Tony Quanton and the July 19 proposal⁵ mark a change in their public posture. It may be largely a ploy, but it's a change we can't ignore.

This means we must be clear as to our objectives and realistic about how much negotiating leverage we have now and how much we are likely to have in the future. If we are going for an internal political formulation which would do for the Nicaraguan opposition what we are offering to the FMLN/FDR in El Salvador, we will have to mount a much more credible threat to the survival of the Sandinistas than now exists. The Contras have grown in number more rapidly than we had expected. However, they are at best now in roughly the same position as the FMLN after the January 1981 "Final Offensive" in El Salvador. They are troublesome to the Sandinistas and require a substantial military response, but they are active only in remote areas and are a long way from threatening Sandinista control over the bulk of the Nicaraguan population. Indeed, there is reason to question whether the Nicaraguan opposition groups, divided among themselves and some still tainted by Somocismo, would do any better in open elections in Nicaragua than the FMLN/FDR would be likely to do in El Salvador.

⁵ In a July 19 address made in Leon, Nicaragua, on the fourth anniversary of the revolution, Ortega indicated that the Government of Nicaragua would participate in international talks to end the violence in Central America. He noted that the government had also called for negotiations with the United States over various issues of concern. (Marlise Simons, "Nicaragua Offers to Join in Talks on Regional Peace: Sandinista Anniversary," New York Times, pp. A1, A9, and Christopher Dickey, "Managua Offers Area Peace Plan," Washington Post, pp. A1, A10; both July 20, 1983) In telegram 3172 from Managua, July 20, the Embassy noted: "While Ortega made the customary swipes at the US, the tone was far different from his strident diatribe last year and reflected the Sandinistas' appreciation of the gravity of military, economic and diplomatic challenges they are now facing." (Department of State, Central Foreign Policy File, Electronic Telegrams, D830414-0003)

However, even the present level of Contra pressure on the Sandinistas may well be short-lived. We may be able to fund the Contras at the current levels through FY 1984, although the current Nicaraguan “peace offensive” will make this even more difficult in the Congress. But, it is most unlikely that the Congress will permit increases in our funding to the level which would be needed over one to two years to make the Contras as much of a threat to the Sandinistas as, for example, the FMLN is now to the Government of El Salvador. Thus, in assessing our options over the next 18 months we should assume that the Contras, as an instrument of political pressure on the Sandinistas, are probably now at their zenith.

The surge in U.S. military activity now underway in the region will heighten Sandinista (and Cuban) uncertainty. It will temporarily help to offset any decline in pressure from the Contras. But this new pressure will be transitory, and we will eventually be faced with the question of what we do as a follow-on.

As you know, there is an alternative analysis: one which argues that the Contras will soon become a real threat to the survival of the Sandinistas and either overthrow the regime or force the Commandantes to seek a political accommodation with the non-Communist opposition. However, the intelligence community concluded in the recent SNIE on Nicaragua that this will not happen with the current level of U.S. funding and support. Again, it would seem imprudent to base U.S. policy on the expectation that the Contras will be able to force the departure of the Sandinistas or their retreat from their political ideology within the next 18 months.

Moreover, the SNIE confirms our earlier judgment that if the Contras were to threaten the survival of the Sandinistas, the Cubans might well intervene. There are already several indications that the Cubans are increasing their presence, not with organized units, but with more advisors who can operate at the small-unit level with Sandinista troops. If this type of Cuban involvement increases, we will be left with a narrow range of unattractive responses. If the Cubans are not operating in organic units and if there is no major assault on Honduras (as opposed to quick strikes against the Contra base camps), it will be extremely difficult for us to use U.S. military force in Nicaragua. Other Latin countries would be alarmed but not to the point at which we could hope to get the OAS umbrella which might make U.S. intervention politically feasible in this country. Even a naval blockade or quarantine would be enormously divisive in the U.S. and in the region, and we might have to sustain it for a long period if we hope to force either the Cubans to withdraw or the Sandinistas to yield.

I conclude, therefore, that the optimal period for trying to deal with the Sandinistas may be rapidly approaching or even already upon us. If the Contra activity begins to melt away as our funding is restricted, the currently favorable diplomatic trends in the region will shift rapidly. Both our friends and the fence-sitters will begin to trim their sails.

Possible Negotiating Objectives

Our principal objectives should be (1) the removal of the Cuban military and security presence from Nicaragua and (2) the construction of a set of constraints on Sandinista behavior toward Nicaragua's neighbors. Our primary negotiating leverage is our and Honduran support for the Contras. We should stick to our insistence on reciprocal, verifiable assurances on cross-border activity and non-interference for which the Contadoran countries would act as guarantors. They would provide observer teams and a virtually permanent mediation service. The diplomatic process itself would be a principal constraint on Sandinista behavior, and we should aim at making this process all-pervasive and on-going.

We cannot drop our democratization principle as it applies to Nicaragua, but we probably have to accept that we are not going to be able to give it much, if any, operational content. We should, nonetheless, try to maximize Contadoran pressure on the 1979 Sandinista pledge for democratic pluralism, keeping this as a political club with which to continue to pound the Sandinistas.

Even if successful, this negotiating approach does not eliminate the Sandinista presence from the Isthmus. It will remain as an on-going threat to our interests. However, if we can significantly constrain the Sandinistas' external behavior and insulate this threat to the rest of the Isthmus, we will have advanced our interests substantially. Over time, there may be some prospect that a de-fanged, economically troubled Nicaragua will gradually drift away from adherence to the Cuban model, particularly if the Cuban military-security connection is limited.

167. Memorandum From the Special Assistant to the Deputy Secretary of State (Edson) and the Executive Assistant to the Deputy Secretary of State (Walker) to the Deputy Secretary of State (Dam)¹

Washington, August 26, 1983

SUBJECT

Taking Stock

The current popular perception is that this Administration lacks a foreign policy “success.” In the public mind, “success” may be synonymous with results in the three major issue areas—Central America, the Middle East, and arms control. Tangible “success” in those areas, however, will probably take time and patience—which, as the Secretary has said, should not be confused with indecision.

Obviously, we should not permit our policy to be railroaded by the public clamor for “success.” Nevertheless, policy isn’t made in a vacuum, and the Administration needs public support for its policies. Moreover, the criticism about our lack of success is demoralizing: Jimmy Carter’s “malaise” may not exist in the country at large, but we sense that it pervades Foggy Bottom. Finally, while the current spate of criticism can be attributed to the White House’s traditional pre-election year need for results, it could also represent a more fundamental loss of confidence in the seventh floor’s ability to run the building (rather than vice versa). For all these reasons, we must stoke the fires in the building, capture peoples’ imagination, and move our policy forward wherever practicable.

This means, generally speaking, that we must stop paying obeisance to the folkways of the building. Indeed, several calculated moves—be they process-oriented, or personnel-oriented—that run contrary to the folkways of the building may be just what the doctor ordered for malaise.

For the Secretary, the task of moving our policy forward translates into a question of identifying a few areas on which to focus his resources over the next 18 months, and in which he can make a significant contribution. The first step in this process is to recognize that the Secretary’s discretionary time is limited. Whether we like it or not, the inertia of foreign policy is such that the bulk of the Secretary’s time must be devoted to the major issue areas—arms control, Central
